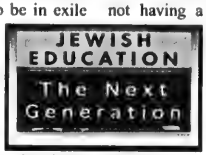
Jewish Life

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

An educational challenge

Rebbe Nahman of Bratslav once remarked that there are two types of people who are distant from their Creator: those who experience God as hidden, and those for whom the fact that God is hidden from them is itself hidden. In other words, to be in exile and to not feel it is the real exile.



I was reminded of the enormous "exile" in our midst, and its implications for education, upon reading a powerful essay by Esther Sha'anan in a superb volume entitled Torah of the Mothers. In it, Sha'anan, a divorced mother of four, writes of her "invisibility" within the traditional Jewish community and the pain that this caused her for many years.

Children raised in single-parent families have educational challenges all their own. Often, working mothers will be stretched to their physical and emotional limits in trying to combine the Herculean tasks of singlehandedly making a living and providing all of the nurturing and support in the myriad of ways that children need.

The various divisions of labour taken for granted in two-parent homes fall upon a single set of shoulders in the case of single mothers.

But the aloneness engendered by not having a partner with whom to share one's joys and sorrows is needlessly exacerbated by the insular and often provincial attitudes of the social world that surrounds these woman.

Sha'anan writes: "A dear friend, in frustration at the blindness of those around her, swears that if she ever remarries, she will refuse any invitations from people in her community to herself and her new spouse to stop in for Kiddush on a Shabbat morning.

"She even has a response prepared. 'Where were you all those years?' Why, she wants to know, was she invisible to them the countless times she walked out of shul alone, two young children in tow?"

The children of single-parent homes embody the paradoxical state of being, in Sha'anan's words, "at once invisible and hyper-visible." Few wish to see such children walking to shul alone on Friday night, or struggling to buy a lulav. (In a parallel comment in his novel, Howard's End, E.M. Forster muses that the "very poor are unthinkable," and of course he's being ironic: it's not that they're unthinkable, it's that we treat them that way.)

And yet, the absence of a second parent often makes these children awkwardly visible at times such as Shabbat or Pesach when the traditional family structure is heavily emphasized.

Schools cannot necessarily bind the wounds that cut through many private lives. But it is incumbent on the teacher to know, in general if not specific terms, that the child in the classroom has been awakened earlier that morning by a beleaguered single mother, who may or may not have had the opportunity to check his homework the night before in addition to taking care of the other children.

Every child deserves the chance to learn, and through learning, the opportunity to heal.

War restitution claims – Part 2

Today, I continue my look at the restitution plans available to victims of Nazi persecution and their heirs, and at claims process resources on the Internet.

Although much of the focus has been on restitution from Swiss banks, other countries now have procedures for compensation. Austria's Reconciliation Fund addresses former slave labourers and forced labourers [www.reconciliationfund.at]. The United States Holocaust Memorial Museum Web site has summarized initiatives to trace Holocaust assets from around the world [www.ushmm.org/assets/frame.htm]. The site includes references to the situation in many European countries in addition to the situation in Argentina, Australia, Brazil and the United States.

Many other commissions have played key roles in setting up the claims process guidelines. The Presidential Advisory Commission on Holocaust Assets was chaired by World Jewish Congress president Edgar Bronfman. The commission conducted research into the fate of assets taken from victims of the Holocaust that came into the possession of the U.S. federal government [www.pcha.gov/]. The commission's December 2000 findings can be found on its Web site. And the International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims was established in co-operation with several European insurance companies, representatives of several Jewish organizations, and the State of Israel. The commission's mandate is to address the issue of unpaid insurance policies issued to victims of the Holocaust [www.icheic.org/].

One issue that is receiving a great deal of publicity is how to deal with art confiscated from Jews during wartime that is now found in galleries around the world. Many of the finest art galleries, including London's National Gallery [www.nationalgallery.org.uk/collection/rest_list.html] and the Ottawa National Gallery [national.gallery.ca/provenance/frame_e.html], have created sections of their Web sites devoted to items in their collection with gaps in their provenance (history of ownership.) In most cases, the Web sites illustrate photos of the artwork and tell what they know about them. The United States Holocaust Memorial Museum has a good summary of international efforts to establish provenance [www.ushmm.org/assets/ushmm4.htm] as does New York's Frick Art Reference Library [www.frick.org/html/provenancelinks.htm].

The fight for restitution has been a difficult and sometimes combative one, but I would like to conclude with the stories of some people who felt strongly about justice being done.

In 1977, Christophe Meili was a security guard at the Union Bank of Switzerland when he discovered bank employees shredding what appeared to be important Holocaust-era documents [www.time.com/time/magazine/1998/dom/980525/file.of_mercy_fameand_ha6.html]. After he handed those documents over to Jewish leaders, Meili was fired by the bank and received death threats. Meili and his family eventually fled to the United States and in order to offer him refuge, President Bill Clinton signed special legislation granting them permanent residency. [thomas.loc.gov/cgi-bin/query/z?c105:S.768:]

The family was presented with an $18,000-a-year scholarship at Chapman University in Orange, Calif. The scholarship came from a group of 650 Holocaust survivors [www.cnn.com/US/9811/20/swiss.guard/].

And finally, I came across this lovely story. In 1977, Kaspar Sutter, Massimiliano Desumma and three other high school students at the Gymnasium Newfeld in Berne set out to right a wrong. As they write in their Web site, "It came as a shock to us to realise that some 50 years after the end of World War II, there are still Holocaust survivors who are in need of support and who, so far, have never received any compensation for their sufferings. We feel that one cannot afford to wait any longer and must give these people a sign of solidarity and support" [www.space.ch/fonds/e/index.html]. Their efforts spread across the country and the Solidarity Fund for the Victims of the Holocaust was created [www.english.upenn.edu/~afilreis/Holocaust/swiss-now.html]. Two years later the five organizers travelled to Israel (at their own expense) and presented 50,000 Swiss francs (over $30,000 US) to Amcha, the Israeli Centre for Holocaust Survivors and the Second Generation [www.amcha.org/].

Or Haemet celebrates its 25th anniversary

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — What began with a handful of children in a basement 25 years ago has evolved into a school specializing in the preservation and promotion of Sephardi heritage.

Maurice Vittori, one of the founders of the school, said that Or Haemet Sephardic School started when Rabbi Eliezer Ben-David, a Sephardi rabbi visiting Toronto from Argentina, recognized the need to bring Sephardi children into their own learning environment.

At that time, Rabbi Ben-David and Rabbi Amram Assayag convinced a number of Ashkenazi philanthropists of the importance of opening a Sephardi school.

"We felt that Sephardi children had difficulties connecting with the schools around them. And even if we got them to go to Ashkenazi schools, the Sephardi heritage would be lost," said Rabbi Assayag, who is now the Judaic studies director of Or Haemet.

"The benefactors' response was incredible," Vittori said. "When the school opened, it was fully funded – even transportation and school supplies."

At first, the school opened in the Petah Tikva, Anshe Castilla synagogue with just a few teachers.

"It was a small classroom atmosphere – almost like having private lessons," Vittori said.

Demand for the school rose very quickly, and Or Haemet outgrew the basement of that synagogue. The school then began a period of wandering.

"In the early 1980s, the management of Or Haemet was handed over to us," Vittori said.

"At the beginning, things were very difficult financially. I had to go to the teachers and tell them we didn't have money to pay their salaries. But no one quit. They just went on teaching. Those teachers were amazing," Vittori said.

"At that time, we knocked on the doors of Canadian Jewish Congress on Brunswick Avenue, and with a grant of $25,000, we persevered," Vittori said.

Sephardi school moved to present location in '97

Many years were spent moving – from Beth Emeth to Temple Sinai to Adath Israel – until the school finally moved into its present location on Bathurst Street in the fall of 1997.

"Today, there are Sephardi children from many different backgrounds," said Messad Boussidan, current president of the school.

The school is now more permanently housed in brand new facilities which include a computer lab, a science lab, a gym and a pool, Boussidan added.

Or Haemet is currently located in the Sephardic Kehila Centre, which was financed mainly through contributions made by philanthropists from the Sephardi community.

Many things have changed over the years. However, Boussidan said, the studious nature of the student body and the commitment of the teachers has remained the same.

I believe this is in large part due to the Sephardi approach to a day in the life of our children, Boussidan said.

"There is a communal feeling which translates into a strong family atmosphere in this school. Everyone recognizes each other – each person walking down the hall is not a stranger. Everyone knows their parents, their grandparents."

Boussidan pointed out that the school's curriculum includes the changes recently implemented in the general studies by the provincial ministry, promotion of Sephardi masoret [heritage], and an emphasis on the Hebrew language in the higher grades.

"I consider the school to be the greatest accomplishment of the Sephardi community," Rabbi Assayag said.

Students at Or Haemet Sephardic School today.

"It is especially fulfilling to see parents and teachers here who were themselves students in the school.

"And to see that the Sephardi tradition not only continues, but that our children grow and flourish in it."

Or Haemet Sephardic School will be celebrating its 25th anniversary with a gala concert featuring Emil Zrihan, head soloist of the Israeli Andalusian Orchestra of Ashdod. For tickets to the June 12 concert, 7:30 p.m., Toronto Centre for the Arts, call 905-669-7653.

Zareinu move-a-thon set

TORONTO — Zareinu's fourth annual Move-a-thon will take place at 1 p.m. June 10 in Earl Bales Park.

Zareinu, which is the Hebrew word for "our children," has become one of Ontario's leading charities for children with special needs aged one month to 12 years, helping those of all backgrounds who face the challenges of Down syndrome, autism, cerebral palsy and other developmental and physical disorders.

The Move-a-thon is Zareinu's main fund-raising event, where Torontonians can walk, run or bike in one of six different events, from a quick 2-km loop to a full 100-km bicycle route. Along the way, there will be prizes, entertainment for the whole family and lots of free food and soft drinks.

To register or for more information, call Shaindy Cohen-Goldstein at 416-661-1800 or visit www.zareinu.org.

"איך אפשר להשוות את הרצח הברוטאלי של שני ילדים יהודים בל"ג בעומד עם מותם של ילדים פלשתינאים שהושמנו בקו האש על ידי הוריהם. שכשהם עינו את שני הילדים היהודיים למוות, האם הפלשתינאים צחקו בהנאה כשהשחטו אותם ותרחו את דמם על כותלי המערתו?

New Israel Fund helps empower Bedouin women

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Amal al Sana-Alhajuj is a household name in the Negev region of Israel.

Al Sana-Alhajuj, 28, a community organizer and activist, co-ordinates Shatil's Bedouin Education Campaign of the Negev, an initiative of the New Israel Fund.

The campaign promotes education among young Bedouin women in the Negev, sponsors high school and university enrichment programs and financial aid, and enlists community support.

As well, she is founder of Shatil's – NIF's training and technical assistance program – Forum for Arab Women's Initiatives in the Negev, and works with young female leaders in Bedouin towns.

She has established professional training courses for Bedouin women and girls, and has overseen projects for An Saan, an organization that works with students on community projects. She also lectures in Israel and abroad about the status of Bedouin women and about Arab rights in the Negev.

About 12,000 Bedouins live in the Negev, half of whom reside in seven urban communities established by the state. The rest are in traditional communities not recognized by state authorities.

"In our transition from a nomadic to a modern lifestyle [women in my mother's generation] lost their skills and jobs. When they lived in tents, they had work to do. They brought water from the well, they sewed clothing, they wove rugs, and they worked the land. They had no free time.

"After the Bedouins were moved to permanent communities, women lost this work. They found themselves with no jobs and very low self esteem, and their status in the community was lowered. They had been a full partner in the tent; now they only bore children," said al Sana-Alhajuj, one of 14 children in her family.

With this transition, she said, there was a dramatic increase in the rate of unemployment, a rise in crime and drug abuse, and a high rate of school drop-outs.

Bedouin youth suffer from the lowest academic achievement rate in Israel, she said. Almost 70 percent of Bedouin children who begin first grade do not complete 12th grade, and only 10 percent of Bedouin take and pass the high school matriculation exams required for university admittance.

The government spends half as much on education for Arab children as for Jewish children, she said, and the Negev, where the vast majority of Bedouins live, receives even less.

Shatil offers an empowerment course for Bedouin women to promote leadership and increase educational attainment. The first component in the course focuses on self-esteem, and the second allows participants to select a topic of interest – health, education or citizen's rights – and receive specific training in this area.

When she was five, she said, "I already knew I wasn't like other girls. Instead of sending me to kindergarten my family let me take the sheep out to the fields – a great responsibility, usually just for boys. But my father wanted to build my personality, to show people that girls could [amount to] something too.

"I discovered at an early age that people could not stop me [from achieving something] because I am a girl. If they stopped me, I would challenge them."

By the time she was 14, she was teaching other women to read and write – her mother among them – and eventually she became one of the first two girls in her tribe to attend university, said al Sana-Alhajuj, who now has a bachelor's degree in social work from Ben Gurion University, and a master's degree in social work from McGill University. She is married to a criminal lawyer.

Amal al Sana-Alhajuj

Today, said al Sana-Alhajuj, there are 94 Bedouin women studying at university – 12 are studying for a master's degree – and 320 women are studying at colleges. "Things began to change after we got organized through Shatil."

'Dudu' Fisher in concert for Lubavitch school

TORONTO — Broadway star and singer David "Dudu" Fisher will headline a concert June 7 in aid of Shmuel Zahavy Cheder Chabad at the Toronto Centre for the Arts.

The Evening of Jewish Song and Renaissance will follow a patrons' benefit reception. Later there will be the 13th annual draw to raise money for the school, which provides an education in the values and lifestyle of Chabad Lubavitch.

Fisher, who originally trained as a cantor, has performed with the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra and at the World Cup Finals, and hosts a television program in Israel. He provided the voice and singing for Moses in Steven Spielberg's The Prince of Egypt.

He also appeared as Jean Valjean in the Broadway and Royal Command Performance of Les Miserables.

Cocktails and hors d'oeuvres will be at 6 p.m., the concert at 7, followed by a sweet table, the draw and a silent auction.

The cost of the concert and draw ticket is $250. A limited number of concert only tickets are available at $100 through Ticketmaster.

Organizers hope the event will raise between $250,000 and $300,000.

Netivot HaTorah's
Preschool Hebrew Immersion.
We believe that what people say and hear matters a great deal - especially to children. That's why the choice of language in school is so important.
We want your child to be connected to the language of our Torah, our people and our land. Our new HEBREW IMMERSION PROGRAM is committed to the primacy of Ivrit in the formation of a strong Jewish identity. Language development, story time, parsha, chagim, themes, math, music and classroom time will all be taught in Ivrit. Your child will be gently encouraged to incorporate an expanding Hebrew vocabulary into everyday use.
At Netivot HaTorah we offer a unique learning environment, imbued with a love of Torah and Jewish learning, and a love of our people and community. We are committed to helping form your child's world through the richness of our traditions and language, guided by the warmth and skill of our teachers.
A small number of openings are still available

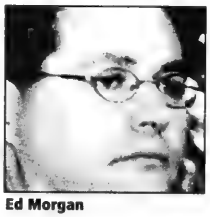
Day Schools & Public Schools It's Not an Either/Or Situation

UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region, have prepared this supplement – the 2nd in a series – to keep our community informed about the recent provincial tuition tax credit for independent schools



Ed Morgan

Dr. Seymour Epstein

HISTORY OF THE STRUGGLE FOR FAIR FUNDING

The Ontario government's announcement of a tax credit for parents of children in independent schools is a major achievement in the Jewish community's 17-year struggle for fair funding for Jewish day schools in this province. Throughout the years, many individuals have pioneered this struggle. Among them are Bernie M. Farber, Israel Janowksi, Henry Koschitzky, Keith Landy, Ed Morgan, Brian Morris, Philip Reichmann, Robert Samery, Murray Segal and Larry Tannenbaum. Thanks to their dedication, the financial burden on parents will soon be lighter.

June 12, 1984 – Introduction of Bill 30 providing full funding for Roman Catholic schools. The Ontario Jewish Association for Equity in Education (OJAEE) is established to lobby the government for fair treatment for Jewish schools.

June 1984 – The government appoints a Commission on Private Schools in Ontario to examine the issue of funding for non-Catholic independent schools.

October 1985 – The Commission's report supports funding of independent schools, stating that failure to do so could be seen as discriminatory.

1987 – Supreme Court challenge of Bill 30. OJAEE argues for equal treatment for non-Roman Catholic faith-based schools. The Court finds that Bill 30 does not violate Canada's Constitution.

November 1, 1991 – Five Jewish parents launch legal action against the province, arguing that the failure to fund all religious schools is discriminatory and contravenes the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. OJAEE acts as intervener. The Court finds for the province. The petitioners appeal the decision.

July 1994 – The Ontario Court of Appeal reaffirms the lower court's decision. The case is appealed to the Supreme Court.

CRITICS OF THE GOVERNMENT'S recent announcement of a tax credit for parents who send their children to day schools claim that the public school system is enough and that a Jewish education is unnecessary – that religion should be taught at home or in a supplementary setting.

Some even insist that this move is the beginning of the end for Ontario's public school system. Two men who strongly disagree with this assertion are UJA FEDERATION Board of Jewish Education Executive Director Dr. Seymour Epstein and Ed Morgan, Chair, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region.

Both men agree that a strong and healthy public school system is essential to Ontario's educational needs. It's not a case of one or the other. They say the two systems complement each other.

"The struggle for public funding of faith-based schools is not in conflict with public school education. On the contrary, we all want to see the public school system thrive," asserts Epstein.

"It is one of the best ways to teach pluralism and tolerance in a multi-cultural society. The argument is simply that it is not the only way," he continues. "Those cultures which require their own school environment for full development are entitled to use public money to develop complementary systems that enhance the full spectrum of the Ontario rainbow."

"We live in a diverse society where cultural differences are celebrated and the rights of minorities must be protected," says Morgan. "Ontario's educational system is a reflection of the larger society in which we live, and as such, must meet the needs of everyone, including Ontario's faith communities.

"In extending tax credits for independent schools, the government has acknowledged that these schools are an important part of how Ontario's children receive an education and that their parents should not be treated as second-class citizens," concludes Morgan.

UJA FEDERATION
No one gift changes more lives.

February 1996 – Day school parent Arieh Waldman argues at the U.N. Human Rights Committee (UNHRC) that Ontario's school funding policy violates the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

November 21, 1996 – The Supreme Court finds that the government could, but is not legally obliged, to fund independent religious schools.

November 3, 1999 – The UNHRC finds Ontario's funding practice to be discriminatory. The Education Ministry immediately reaffirms the government's commitment to the existing publicly funded education system.

May 2000 – Ontario Parents for Equality in Education Funding (OPEEF) and the Jewish Parents for Equality in Education Funding (JPEEF) hold a rally at Queen's Park. Over 3,000 attend.

September 2000 – OJAEE and UJA FEDERATION reconstitute to form the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools (OAJDS).

May 9, 2001 – In its 2001 budget, the Ontario government introduces a refundable tax credit for parents of children in independent schools.

UPDATE: On May 29, the provincial government announced that the finance committee will hold two weeks of public hearings on the tax credit. UJA FEDERATION & Canadian Jewish Congress urge you to contact the following individuals to demonstrate your support for the government's initiative:

Benjamin Hertz

Bank office helps investors do business

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — From his office on the 22nd floor of a North York business tower, Benjamin Hertz can look out onto a marvelous view facing west.

On a clear day he can see as far as Etobicoke or maybe Mississauga, but his gaze is directed much farther afield, to Winnipeg, Edmonton, Calgary and Vancouver, not to mention his home base of Toronto.

Hertz is chief representative of Bank Leumi Le-Israel, and it's his job to scan the business scene and assist the bank's customers in doing business in Toronto and Western Canada.

For Hertz, much of the country is his bailiwick, and anywhere a businessman or investor needs help doing business in Canada – or Israel, for that matter – he's there to help.

A couple of weeks ago, 30 Israeli investors representing a dozen companies called on him for advice on the Canadian real estate market. Flush with surplus cash, they were searching for investment opportunities in Toronto, Montreal and even Saskatchewan, which they visited.

As a representative of the investors' Israeli bank, Bank Leumi, Hertz provided the advice and direction to facilitate their search.

"We are here to represent the Bank Leumi Group worldwide. So, if a person or a company wants a banking relationship abroad, we're here to assist him with that. We're involved with Israeli businesses coming to Canada, and with Canadian businesses going to Israel. I'm also involved here in banking corresponding relationships, which are between banks," he said.

Because the representative office is not a bank branch, it cannot borrow or lend money or do any of the other things commonly associated with banking, Hertz explained. Instead, the representative offices in Toronto and Montreal serve as a sort of middleman, economic counselor, or facilitator for Bank Leumi customers.

His help operates in both directions, so, for example, he can help Canadians set up offshore accounts at any of the Bank's many branches worldwide. But unlike full-service banks, the representative office does not handle any money. "Any profits to be made will be made abroad," he said.

Bank Leumi, founded almost 100 years ago at the direction of Theodor Herzl, vies with Bank Hapoalim for the title of Israel's largest bank. Both have set up representative offices in Toronto. Worldwide, Bank Leumi boasts US $53 billion in assets, and last year, the bank's return on equity reached 15.3 percent, slightly ahead of Bank Hapoalim's 15.1 percent. However, its profit cashed in at US $1.6 billion, slightly behind Bank Hapoalim's US $1.62 billion, so it appears bragging rights as Israel's top bank are still up for grabs.

Canada-Israel trade has been growing in recent years, and his office has been busy promoting that exchange, Hertz said.

While the larger-scale Canadian investments in Israel are well known – think of Canadian-inspired office towers in Tel Aviv – Hertz said he was surprised at some of the small-scale Israeli activities in Canada. Hertz knows of more than 300 Israelis who have purchased condominium units in Toronto strictly as investments, he said.

After 35 years in banking with Bank Leumi, there's little that should surprise Hertz. Prior to his posting in Toronto three years ago, he served for 3½ years as manager of Bank Leumi's branch in Chicago. Unlike the situation in Toronto, the Chicago office was a commercial bank involved in wholesale business, such as business loans.

His first foreign posting was to Manhattan in 1981 where he was in charge of international business and the bank's Latin American desk.

In 1986 he returned to the Tel Aviv head office and was put in charge of the securities department. He also served as a board member of the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange.

At the time, Bank Leumi, along with other Israeli banks, operated branches in Toronto. Although he's not familiar with their situation at the time, Hertz believes they suffered, along with numerous other banks, from the collapse of real estate prices and the recession of the early 1990s. They departed the Canadian scene, and when they returned, they did not come as full-service banks, but "maybe in the future they will," he said.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Albert Silver and his family fled Germany in 1939, driven out by waves of Nazi anti-Semitism.

Such was his lingering anger and bitterness that he never thought he would see Berlin again.

But a month and a half ago, in a moment of understated triumph, he returned to Berlin as an honoured guest of the city that had once scorned and humiliated him.

"They rolled out the red carpet for us," said Silver, a 72-year-old psychologist in private practice in Burlington and Toronto.

Along with a group of former Berliners from the United States, Canada, Israel, France, Britain, Switzerland and Australia, Silver visited Berlin from April 24 to May 1. The only other Canadian on the trip was Peter Loewenthal, a resident of Toronto.

They were there under a program established in 1966 for Jews who had been ousted from Berlin by Nazi persecution.

"Berlin went all out for us," he said, referring to the busy schedule of events planned for the visitors.

"They tried to make us feel they were sorry for what had happened, and, as much as possible, to put it right."

When he received the invitation, Silver was overcome by mixed feelings .

"We were persecuted in Germany and forced to flee. Berlin was not a place filled with happy memories. On the other hand, I was born in Berlin, and I wanted to come to terms with the past and release some of my pain, sorrow and great sense of loss."

Silver lost three uncles and three aunts, as well as his grandparents, during the Holocaust.

He has faint memories of that nation-wide pogrom.

"I remember something happening and people whispering about it. As a child, I didn't have a real appreciation of what was going on."

On their flight from Berlin seven months before the outbreak of World War II, the Silvers, including his sister Berta, went to Rotterdam, Holland, and then on to New York City.

Later, as a student, Silver studied at City College of New York and Michigan State University.

In 1970, he and his wife made aliyah. After three years in Israel, they settled in Canada.

Silver's travelling companion in Berlin was his 21-year-old daughter, Ruth, who, he said, was "deeply moved" by the experience.

The 59 participants were given sightseeing tours of Berlin and Potsdam and fêted at receptions hosted by the mayor of Berlin, the Berlin Senate, the vice-president of the German Bundestag and Berlin's chief of protocol.

They also visited Berlin's new Jewish Museum and the Jewish community centre and stopped at several synagogues and Jewish cemeteries, including Weissensee, where Silver's birth mother is buried. She was murdered in 1931, two years before Adolf Hitler's accession to power.

In addition, they were serenaded by a children's choir, attended a play and were treated to a boat ride on the Wannsee.

Silver, who speaks fluent German, did not feel uncomfortable in Germany.

However, before the trip, he said he was somewhat hostile to Germany and Germans.

It would be foolhardy, he said, not to acknowledge that a new, democratic Germany has emerged from the ashes of National Socialism.

Unfair to imagine non-existent bias

Ezra Levant is but one of the most recent victims of the internal ritual of hara-kiri that has characterized the Canadian Alliance over the last couple of months. To most observers, he is nothing more than a footnote in the sordid tale of Stockwell Day's demise as leader of the party. To some, however, Levant's "resignation" (read: dismissal) raised the issue of possible anti-Semitism gurgling just below the surface of the Alliance.

The case in support of this contention is mostly circumstantial. The CA and its predecessor, the Reform Party, have attracted more than a few notorious characters to its fold over the years, people like Doug Christie – the zealous defender of James Keegstra, Malcom Ross and Ernst Zundel. The proponents of the anti-Semitism theory are also quick to point to the significant number of evangelical Christians within the Alliance and its parliamentary caucus.

As for their trump card, they remind us that Levant used to quarterback Preston Manning's question period strategy team before mysteriously leaving for an ultimately short-lived appointment to the National Post editorial page. The conspiracy theorists suggest that, in fact, Levant was never accepted within the core Reform family and was pushed out the door.

Of course, none of these arguments makes any sense.

First, regardless of one's opinion of the Alliance program, both the CA and the Reform Party that came before it have acted swiftly and unequivocally whenever a known anti-Semite had joined or attempted to join the party. Their record is impeccable on that score.

Second, while the CA is populated with a disproportionate number of evangelical Christians, as a group, they have consistently been among Israel's strongest supporters in the House of Commons.

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

Finally, Levant counts Day (and son Logan) among his closest of friends and was invited back to help out during an especially sticky period. Levant left Manning's office because an opportunity at the Post fit neatly into his plans – especially since he wanted to be in Toronto where his soon-to-be-wife resided.

The truth is that Levant is no longer with the Leader of the Opposition simply because he erred in leaking a document to the Post. No conspiracy, no anti-Semitism. Those who now call the shots in the party (primarily, John Reynolds) wanted to send a message about the new way the CA would be doing business and Levant merely provided Reynolds with an opportunity to make the point.

All of this to say that while genuine anti-Semitism exists on the margins of all political parties, it is of no value to imagine it where it does not exist. Not only is it unfair, it trivializes the seriousness of anti-Semitic incidents when they truly arise.

Community volunteers honoured

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, who acted as master of ceremonies, commended the Vereds for the many activities they have undertaken. They have taken the principle of giving back and raised it to an art form, he said.

Not only have the Vereds, both individually and as a couple, contributed countless hours of their time to Hillel Academy, a Jewish day school with 400 students from kindergarten to Grade 8, and numerous other community activities, they are also the parents of five daughters and one son — two graduates and four current students of Hillel Academy.

Speaking as a friend of the honorees, Solly Patrontasch noted that Jewish schooling is an integral part of the couple s value system, and praised the Vereds for their dedication.

Liz and Arnie serve as an example to all of us, he said. We can honour them by following their lead. Let us teach our children as Liz and Arnie teach theirs.

Liz and Arnie were presented with a medal designed by Irving Osterer, to be known as the Vered Hillel Medal.

In his acceptance speech, Arnie thanked and praised his wife. My achievements are your achievements, he said.

Being a volunteer and working together with others to benefit the community is a rewarding experience.

He concluded by encouraging others to get involved as well. There is so much to do, he said, and everyone can help. Together we can make a difference.

Author explores world of art plundered by Nazis

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Worldwide interest in the location of vast quantities of priceless art stolen by the Nazis during the Holocaust is due largely to the research and detective work of Hector Feliciano.

Feliciano's eight-year search for the plundered art is detailed in his book, The Lost Museum: The Nazi Conspiracy to Steal the World's Greatest Works of Art.

The author, who has appeared on 60 Minutes, has been interviewed on CNN, NBC and ABC, and will soon be seen on CBC's Newsworld.

Feliciano spoke recently at Congregation Machzikei Hadas at a lecture sponsored by Yitzhak Rabin High School, in association with the Canadian Jewish Congress and The Canadian Museum Association.

He became interested in the missing art while working in France for the Washington Post, Feliciano said.

"There were very few documents on the subject. Many of the documents were classified, and many archives were closed," he said.

He encountered a great deal of opposition in his search but persevered tirelessly, amassing clue after clue and following every lead, he said.

He based his search on the lost art of five families and concentrated on art stolen from France.

"By the end of the war, France was the most looted country – 100,000 works of art had been looted."

Feliciano left his job to work on his book full time. The result, according to Jack Silverstone, executive vice-president and general counsel of Canadian Jewish Congress, "reads like an art history book and a spy novel at the same time."

The book reveals the meticulous and systematic looting by the Nazis. "Ironically, the detailed inventories they prepared have helped to track down and identify the missing works of art," said Feliciano.

When he began his work, he said, he was more or less alone in his quest. "Things that were unthinkable at the time the book was published are now part of the landscape. There are Web sites and full-time museum employees researching the backgrounds of works of art."

Ottawa media personality Peter van Dusen, MC for the evening, asked Feliciano how it felt to hold the lists in his hands and to meet the families whose art had been stolen.

"As a journalist and as a writer," said Feliciano, "you believe in the power of the word and the power of the image. For me, personally and professionally, it is a dream, and I ask myself whether there will be something else in my life after this."

Getting to know the families has been a gratifying experience for Feliciano, he said.

He has been very moved to see the emotional response of the people whose art was recovered.

"It was like a member of the family who had disappeared in the camps," he said.

Van Dusen said, "Most reporters feel good if they are able to change the way people act and feel in their little area. Hector has changed the way the world is behaving and reacting in response to this situation."

Get refusal said harmful to kids as well as women

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — When a Jewish man refuses to grant his estranged wife a get (religious divorce), he is hurting not only the woman, but also any children that she may not bear as a result of her predicament, says Marilyn Mattie Klein, founder of L'Maan B'Nos Yisrael International.

A woman without a get is forbidden to marry in a Jewish ceremony and any children she may have will be considered illegitimate for all future generations, Klein said.

Any one of these women could be the woman chosen by God to be the mother of the Messiah, and thus a man withholding a get could even be prolonging the arrival of the Messiah on earth, said Klein, who established L'Maan B'Nos Yisrael to help these women, known as agunot.

Klein and Rabbi Shmuel Gamliel recently spoke at a weekend Shabbaton at Congregation Beth Shalom West. Rabbi Gamliel, director of the Agunah Department of the Rabbinical Courts of the State of Israel, described how he travels around the world to track down recalcitrant spouses and to assist them in in any way possible to grant their wives a get.

"Sometimes people are reluctant," he said, "as they themselves don't care, but any children of a future marriage will be illegitimate without a get."

Rabbi Gamliel has used his international network of friends and supporters to track down and negotiate with men in order to "free" the wives.

"If you don't have the facility to write the get on the spot, such as in cases where there are no witnesses, according to Halachah you can do it by power of attorney," Rabbi Gamliel said.

He told of one such instance when he met with an Israeli who was incarcerated in Soledad prison in the United States.

Klein and her organization arrange such activities as get information days, agunah get days that provide centres where people can obtain a get at no charge, and support groups for agunot. It is common for agunot to feel alone, and often they are in dire financial need as well, having been deserted by husbands who refuse them appropriate support, she said.

"Canada is a leader in demanding that the get should always be given prior to a civil divorce," Klein said. She also praised the Ottawa Jewish community for being exceptionally progressive and united in its support for the plight of agunot.

"The Ottawa community and the rabbis of Ottawa are a shining example and a role model," she said. "There is a reason that there is no major problem here – the rabbis and the community leaders here don't tolerate it."

Rabbi Howard Finkelstein, spiritual leader of Congregation Beth Shalom West, said his congregation had taken a vote several years ago, deciding that any member who refused his wife a get would not be given an aliyah to the Torah nor be permitted to assume a position on the board. All the other local congregations followed suit.

Cummings remembered as family, community anchor

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Maxwell Cummings, whose name has been associated with innumerable community and city institutions, was known as a philanthropist whose generosity and commitment had no bounds.

Obituary

To his family, however, Cummings – who died peacefully on May 23, a little more than a month after celebrating his 103rd birthday April 19 – was known simply as "papa Mac," the family patriarch around whom family life flowed and revolved.

His funeral, held on May 25 at the Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue, was attended by about 500 people, including dozens of extended family-members and community leaders.

Speakers described Cummings as the anchor who held family members together and as a man who, even in his final days and despite blindness, knew every grandchild, great-grandchild, and great-great-grandchild by name.

"Our family and community lost a patriarch," grandson Steven Cummings said. He lived his life "with grace, elegance, and confidence. He did it his way."

Steven Cummings, himself due to become FEDERATION CJA president this fall, recalled his grandfather as a man of "piercing insight" and as a "mentor, role model and good citizen."

His last birthday, he said, was one in which every family spoke from their "hearts and souls" in conveying their love for him.

"It was a celebration of life and the unity of family," he said.

Rabbi Barry Gelman said that Cummings would forever be remembered for his "charm, charisma, his great presence in a room and for his grace."

He was able to "judge people quickly, but then accept that person for who they were… He knew how to balance justice with grace and generosity," Rabbi Gelman said.

Try to imagine, he said, what today's Montreal community would look like had it not been for Cummings, who spearheaded the construction of the Cummings House, the home of FEDERATION CJA, and contributed to so many other community and city institutions.

Joshua and Casey Cummings remembered their great-grandfather as someone looked upon with "awe and respect," holding court in his red chair as the family gathered at his Westmount home for Jewish holiday celebrations and weekly Shabbat dinners.

Casey, who was born when Cummings was 72, also remembered him as having a great sense of humour and of instilling the values of being "well-rounded, charitable, caring and kind."

Rabbi Gelman said above all else, Cummings would be remembered for his "good name," one of the three "crowns" of Judaism that can only be bestowed by others.

Cummings was born in Saint John, N.B. the son of David and Beatrice Cummings. They moved to Montreal in 1911.

When he was 14, he began to work in his father's shoe business to help reverse business losses.

Few realize, said Rabbi Gelman, that Cummings' real-estate career began when he bought too-large premises for the expanded shoe business and then rented the excess space out to others.

"He found it more profitable to selling shoes," Rabbi Gelman said.

As a developer, Cummings was responsible for Canada's first shopping centre, the Norgate Shopping Centre in St. Laurent, as well for being among the first Canadians to develop low-cost housing.

As a philanthropist in the Jewish community, he was the principal benefactor of the Cummings House (dedicated in May 1973), as well as the principal benefactor of the Golden Age Centre named for him and his late brother, Nathan.

In 1989, Cummings was also the main donor to the Cummings Family Pavilion for Medical Science at the Jewish General Hospital (JGH), where he was chair of the board of trustees.

Other Jewish institutions linked with Cummings' name include the Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue, Jewish National Fund, Baron de Hirsch Institute, YM-YWHA, Weizmann Institute, the Israel Museum in Jerusalem, as well as numerous other Israel-based institutions of higher learning.

In the wider community, Cummings was also a benefactor to many Montreal hospitals, universities and other institutions. He helped his sons Robert and Jack to completely rebuild the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts in 1976 through a $500,000 donation. A performance hall there was named in his honour.

For his contribution, Cummings was named a member to the Order of Canada in 1978 and to the Order of Quebec in 1990.

Cummings was predeceased by his wife of 70 years, Victoria (Queenie), son Jack, and siblings Ralph, Nathan, Harold, Ben and Minnie Abbey.

He is survived by a son, Robert, six grandchildren, 15 great-grandchildren, and a great-great-grandchild, Nathan, who, along with 100 others, attended his great-great-grandfather's 100th birthday party in 1998.

A solid friendship: the guys celebrate 50 years

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although the concept of bonding, in the sense of forming an emotional attachment, had yet to enter the vernacular, a group of teenage boys with an appetite for sports, girls and hi-jinks forged a bond more lasting than they ever anticipated in 1950s Toronto at the then-new YMHA.

Last month, eight members of Club Gilmore – a name chosen from the stock pages – celebrated 50 years of friendship, not to mention poker games, with a trip to Las Vegas.

In 1951, two years before the Jewish Y opened at the corner of Bloor Street West and Spadina Avenue, the 15-year-old downtowners met at 44 St. George Street, a satellite of the Y on Brunswick Avenue.

"It had a gymnasium and some club rooms," recalled David Himelfarb over lunch recently at a mid-town deli. The new building, however, was "the last word in community centres...It was where all the Jewish kids congregated. Every Sunday night there was a dance. It was the centre of your social life."

The Y was "the common ground that brought us together initially," said Harvey Capp in a separate phone interview, referring to the various schools members attended – among them Central Commerce, Harbord Collegiate and Oakwood Collegiate.

"It was a wonderful time in my life," he recalled, adding that the fraternity members he encountered at university "didn't have the remotest idea" of the type of experience Club Gilmore provided.

Aside from regular club events, like meetings and athletic activities, the boys spent just about every weekend together. "I wouldn't dream of going out on a Saturday night without making the phone calls and checking with everyone," said Earl Crangle, who along with Himelfarb met with The CJN to reminisce about his teen years and what their long-term friendship means.

"You knew you were always part of a group if you wanted to be."

Back then, going out meant walking, often to see a show, stopping at one house after another to pick up members on the way. "Who had a car in those days?" asked Himelfarb.

The early years were filled with sports like softball and basketball, with YMHA clubs, each boasting its own jacket and logo, competing against one another. Sometimes, to raise money, members would run a raffle for 10 cents a ticket. "It was a great way to get girls' phone numbers," said Himelfarb, smiling.

Dues were $2 a week, and the boys were assigned an older adviser. At one time, Sonny Langer, now a Toronto caterer, was assigned to the club.

The Y was like a second home until the boys started getting married and drifting apart. They also rented a club room above a store at College St. and Brunswick Ave. -- the scene of meetings, parties and weekly poker games.

Memorable party entertainment included The Operation, a skit performed in shadows behind a sheet. "I worked in a butcher shop. I'd bring some liver," said Crangle (aka Butch), the group's one-time social director, whose role included pulling out various organs, and finally a baby (actually a doll), and flinging them at the audience.

Drinking and drugs were never an issue, according to Crangle, except for one Passover evening when the boys were still under 21 (then the legal drinking age) and Manischewitz was the beverage of choice for a Gilmore-style third Seder, complete with a police raid.

Following a laughter-filled 1967 reunion, members decided not to lose touch again. Since then, every month, a core group of 10 has met to play poker. "It's the same game, for the same stakes – quarters – that we did 50 years ago, although we can all afford to play for dollars," said Crangle. "Every time we laugh and joke and rib each other. We're still teenagers at heart."

Now that they're in their mid-60s, Himelfarb and Crangle joke that the focus of their conversation has changed from girls to medications. In fact they don't take their health for granted, having lost one member to heart disease.

Over the years they've attended each others' simchahs as well as funerals and shivahs. Their ranks include a number of businessmen, a dentist, two lawyers and an electrical engineer.

"We grew up together," said Crangle.

"The game's just an excuse to get together on a regular basis and catch up," explained Himelfarb. "Every time we get together we talk about the old days. We continue to relive our youth...Geez, those were terrific times!"

Stretch your mind in Vancouver this fall

By MARLANE PRESS
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — A day of Jewish learning, called Stretch Your Mind With The Best of Hebrew U, will bring some of the brightest minds of Hebrew University to Vancouver this September.

The one-day event's seminars will focus on topics ranging from Jewish mysticism to science and technology, and human rights to religious and Bible theory.

Co-ordinated by several Vancouver Jewish organizations – Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver, and Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver – Stretch Your Mind marks the first time the three groups have collaborated on such a major endeavour.

"I've lived in Vancouver for 32 years and this has never happened before in the Jewish community," said Dvori Balshine, executive director of the Pacific region's Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. "It's quite amazing, really."

Sam Hanson, the event's public relations spokesperson, agreed, adding that he's eager to bring the university to the community for the first time.

"Our primary focus is to bring the university to Vancouver, bringing cultural and educational activities to our community," Hanson said.

"It's a significant event because we always seem to be competing with other organizations for time and space – and dollars – and this community is not that large so we do tend to compete. We hope this is the start of something important in our community toward doing more and more communal activities. I hope we can create a formula by which different organizations can create and co-sponsor community activities."

Scheduled for Sept. 8 and 9, the event will kick off Saturday evening at the Jewish Community Centre with music and a reception. Sunday's schedule will include two educational seminars in the morning, lunch, an afternoon class and a wrap-up panel discussion. Each class will run approximately one hour and seminar sizes will be limited to about 30 attendees per session.

Along with 11 representatives of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem's Vancouver chapter, Balshine attended last year's day of learning in Toronto and was very impressed with what she saw and heard.

"There was a buzz in the room – a real campus atmosphere," Balshine said. "The fact that 400 to 500 people gathered to learn on a Sunday was very exciting. It was a combination of things like the calibre of the speakers and the professors. I thought to myself, 'Let's try to create this in Vancouver.'"

Five Hebrew University professors are confirmed to attend and lead seminars at this year's event, and Balshine said a sixth is in the works.

Head of the university's department of Jewish studies, Rahel Elior's research interests include Jewish mysticism, Kabbalah, messianism, Chassidism and Jewish women. She has written, edited and published numerous books and articles, and has taught as a visiting professor at many institutions, including Oxford University, the London Institute of Jewish Studies and University of Michigan, Ann Arbor.

Gershon Golomb is an associate professor of cancer studies. His research topics include cardiovascular implantable systems, new routes of drug administration, gene delivery and therapy, prevention of biocompatibility problems and calcification in implanted biomaterials including bioprosthetic heart valves.

Marilyn Koolik is the director of the Stephen Spielberg Jewish Film Archive at Hebrew University. Koolik lectures at professional and academic conferences around the world and has had three research papers published by Harvard University. She began working at the Jewish Film Archive in 1981.

Professor of law Frances Raday cites labour law, human rights, feminism and law, and disadvantaged groups as her main academic research interests. Raday received law degrees from the London School of Economics and from Hebrew U, and was admitted to the English bar at Grey's Inn in 1965. She is also chief editor of the Israel Law Review.

Yair Zakovitch is a Bible professor and a scholar in literary analysis of the bible. His primary interests are the Bible as literature, biblical historiography, and early Jewish and Christian interpretation of the Bible. He has written numerous books and has taught at the University of Pennsylvania and the University of California, Berkeley.

For more information about the event, call the Vancouver chapter of the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University of Jerusalem at 604-257-5133.

An ethnic celebration of Jewish cuisine

By RUTH HEIGES
Israel Press Service

In the 1980s, guests in Israeli hotels might have been served an artistically arranged morsel touted as kosher nouvelle cuisine, as Israeli chefs proudly embarked on adapting that culinary movement to the stringencies of the laws of kashrut.

It can be argued that the simplification set in motion by the nouvelle-cuisine phase – which saw the elimination of heavy sauces, followed by greater health consciousness in eating – set the stage for a new return to basics.

Now, Israeli chefs are at the forefront of what has been termed the slow-food movement – the backlash against fast food, which stresses fresh, local ingredients and giving each dish its full measure of care and time.

Miki Nir, executive chef of the Dan Panorama Hotel in Tel Aviv, refers to it as mother's kitchen. The special advantage that diners enjoy from this is that the mothers of his staff members come from a wide range of countries.

"No matter what anyone says, we do not have an Israeli cuisine," he says. "What we do have is a Jewish cuisine, and it is time we gave it the honour it deserves and took pride in it."

With the aromas of the day's Persian-themed buffet wafting around him – finely chopped spinach in a lemony broth, perfumed rice, lamb kebabs shaped by hand onto wooden skewers, minced-chicken balls spiked with cumin – Nir explains that there is a two-week cycle of daily themes, based on the Jewish cuisines of various countries. These range from Iraqi, Tunisian and Moroccan to South American, Russian and Bukharian (the latter reflecting the kitchens of the Asian provinces of the former Soviet Union).

The concept arose from an exercise among his kitchen staff, comprised of cooks from around the world, including Thailand and Vietnam. For their own diversion, they started taking turns cooking meals for each other. The labour-intensive dishes were child's play in their hands.

"We all found it so enjoyable that I sent them to their mothers to bring back more recipes," Nir relates. "Then, we started the process of adjusting the recipes for the large volume needed for a restaurant buffet. As these things go, though, many of their mothers cook on the basis of experience, rather than measured quantities. But, being professionals, we experimented and were able to make the necessary adjustments."

One of those who took up the challenge in earnest was sous-chef Roman Elizarov, whose family immigrated to Israel in 1979 from Tajikistan, an Asian province of the former Soviet Union.

"Of course, our food was taken from the Muslims among whom we lived, and it was adapted to eliminate such things as using yogurt with meat," Elizarov says.

Fittingly, his family settled in Ramle, a mixed Jewish and Arab city located not far from Ben-Gurion Airport, happy to find an environment similar to what they had known. In fact, while he is clearly comfortable in a luxury hotel, wearing a crisp white jacket embroidered with his name in gold thread, Elizarov unabashedly admits that he still prefers eating at home, where the food is set on a large platter in the centre of the table.

"Here I'm in charge of the Russian and Bukharian buffets," he explains. "One of my specializations is dough, such as for kreplach, piroshki and pelmeni, for the Russian buffet. When we have the Bukharian meal on alternate weeks, I prepare one of seven different styles of rice and a similar variety of soups. In fact, some of the regular patrons phone in advance to find out which kind of rice I'm making and decide whether to come for lunch at the Deli Dan on that basis."

Reuven Bar Lev, the Dan's food and beverage manager, confirms that a large proportion of those patronizing the buffets are Israelis, and that they particularly favour the themes that reflect the complex Sephardi dishes. Having come to Israel from Egypt at the age of five, Bar Lev says, "I remember my mother getting up at five o'clock in the morning to start cooking, even though there were only four people in our family! Our modern lifestyle and norms just don't allow for this anymore."

"We have been trying to copy the American way of life and the French style of cooking," Nir says. "But we don't have to copy anyone. If tourists want French food, they'll go to France. Here, they come to taste Jewish food."

TUNISIAN MAFRUM

5 potatoes, thinly sliced
2 onions, chopped
1 bunch parsley, chopped
1 cup flour
2 or 3 eggs, beaten salt pepper
olive oil for frying

Tomato sauce:
6 tbsp. tomato paste
2 garlic cloves, mashed turmeric, cayenne pepper, salt, black pepper

Soak the onion and parsley in salted water for 20 minutes. Drain and squeeze out, thoroughly. Mix into the chicken, and season to taste. Form the meat into patties (slightly smaller than the potato slices).

Place each patty on a potato slice and cover with a second slice. Dredge each "sandwich" in flour, then dip in egg. Deep-fry for several minutes.

Prepare the tomato sauce. In a large pot, quickly cook the garlic in the tomato paste. Add the water and bring to a boil. Season with the turmeric, cayenne pepper, salt, and black pepper to taste. Simmer for about 20 minutes.

Place the potato-meat "sandwiches" in the sauce and cook for another 40 minutes.

IRAQI BEET SOUP WITH KUBEH

½ kilo (1.1 lb.) semolina
2½ cups warm water
7 cups chicken broth
3 large beets, cubed
½ cup fresh lemon juice
2-3 tbsp. sugar
½ lb.) ground beef
2 onions, chopped
1 cup chopped celery leaves
salt and pepper

Lightly salt the water and pour it into a large, shallow dish. Sprinkle the semolina into the water and mix, creating a very moist mixture. Let this stand for about 20 minutes.

In a pot, mix together the broth, beets, sugar and lemon juice; add salt and pepper, to taste. Bring to a boil, reduce the flame, and cook for about 40 minutes.

Meanwhile, mix the meat with the onions and celery. Season with salt and black pepper.

Shape the semolina mixture into balls (3 to 4 inches in diameter). Stuff each with the meat mixture and close over the ball.

After the soup has cooked for the 40 minutes, add the kubeh (stuffed semolina balls) to the boiling soup and cook for about another 20 minutes.

'I think of my own kids,': German FM Fischer

By ADAR PRIMOR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Visiting German Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer gets upset when he speaks of last Friday's suicide bombing in Tel Aviv.

"After all, I was there," he says. "Three hours before the terror attack, I was jogging there."

Fischer seems to have been deeply affected by the incident. His tone of voice and the rhythm of his words change from time to time during the interview.

"The first thought that went through my mind was about my two children – 17 and 22 years old – in other words, the ages of the young people who go out to discotheques on Friday nights, as do millions of young people all around the world. I love the lifestyle of Tel Aviv, one of the most wonderful cities I know. And now, the lives of... innocent people have been taken and many have been injured."

Fisher defines the attack as "a murder" and "a terrible crime." He came to Israel on a mediation mission, to promote peace, and he knew the situation was complex, but never imagined it was so complex.

"There is no doubt that [the attack] has completely altered the situation in the region because we are now at a juncture between war and peace and the situation could change dramatically within hours.

"Therefore, our message at the meeting with President [Yasser] Arafat in Ramallah was passed on without beating about the bush. I explained to him that he had to act immediately if he wanted to save the peace process. He has to deliver. We have no need for words right now, but deeds – positive deeds," Fischer says, emphatically.

Fischer does not speak in the often abstract language of diplomats. The positive deeds he demands of the Palestinian Authority are very clearly defined: an immediate, sustainable ceasefire; the implementation of tough security measures; the renewal of the security co-operation with Israel, the arrest of "those responsible for the horrendous act of terrorism," a public condemnation of their actions and their prosecution.

His tone softens when he speaks of the Israeli obligations: "This is a nightmare for any democratic government. Concern for the security of its citizens is an obligation of the government of Israel. This is absolutely obvious." Nevertheless, Fischer hopes that "the people and government in Israel will find the courage not to seek vengeance.

"There is a slight chance for a positive turnaround," he says. "We must use this chance, even if it is very marginal. We must exploit it within hours. I hope we will succeed in doing so. If we don't, we will at least know that we have done the utmost."

Fischer clearly places most of the blame for the situation on the shoulders of the PA leader. "Matters are in Arafat's hands," he says, denying a report in Yediot Achronot that he had threatened Arafat with a suspension of all German economic aid to the Palestinians if the PA leader did not announce a ceasefire.

"That report is a mixture of fiction and non-fiction," he says. "We spoke about the draft of the declaration, the current situation and nothing more."

The report in Yediot also said that after the German minister asked Arafat to disassociate himself from terrorism "from the bottom of his heart," the PA leader replied: "And the Germans' disassociation from the Holocaust; do you really want to tell me that it is from the bottom of the heart?"

Fischer gets angry. "We never spoke about that – never, never, never, never," he says. "Don't take any notice of such fairy tales."

Fischer held a second unscheduled meeting with Arafat in Ramallah Sunday evening; he also extended his stay in Israel by a day. "This is not a matter of an independent German [peace] initiative," he says.

"We have a special responsibility toward Israel that is based on our tragic history. We will never forget this responsibility. This is one of the faits accomplis of our policies as a democratic Germany.

"As Europeans," he continues, "we have an interest in peace in the Middle East. We are speaking about neighbouring regions and I think Europe should play a stronger and more positive role. Israel knows Germany is trying to achieve this. We have to be valuable partners for both sides."

Arafat orders a halt on attacks; some doubt effect

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Last weekend, Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat ordered the heads of several PA security forces to work on halting terrorist attacks against Israeli targets, Israel's defence establishment sources said.

On Sunday, there was a significant drop in the number of shooting attacks, with only five incidents reported, none of them resulting in any injuries. Defence sources said there was also a drop in the level of incitement being broadcast by Palestinian media, with more talk in favour of a ceasefire instead.

But the PA had not arrested any freed terrorists or begun collecting weapons – the steps to which Israel attributes primary importance – and the defence establishment is skeptical that Arafat will do it any time soon.

A senior defence source said the orders Arafat has issued to his forces are comprehensive – stop all firing at soldiers and settlers in the territories, to keep Palestinians away from points of friction with Israel, and to prevent bombs and bombers from entering Israel. These instructions were also given to paramilitary organizations like Fatah, Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

But several of the paramilitary organizations – in particular Hamas and Islamic Jihad – declared they will ignore the ceasefire and continue their attacks.

The National and Islamic Organizations – a coalition of 13 groups formed after the outbreak of the violence last September that includes Fatah, Hamas and Islamic Jihad – issued a similar statement. It did not relate to the ceasefire directly, but declared, "the intifadah is a legitimate right of the Palestinians to defend themselves against aggression and occupation."

According to Israeli defence sources, some senior Fatah activists said last Sunday they do not interpret Arafat's orders as a complete ceasefire, and thus believe they still have permission to carry out some shooting attacks.

But while both the government and the defence establishment are doubtful that the ceasefire will prove real, Israel plans to continue its policy of restraint in order to give Arafat a chance to demonstrate his bona fides.

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, speaking at a meeting with foreign ministry officials, was explicit on this subject. There is "no reason to expect an Israeli offensive right now," he said. The cabinet has therefore ordered the IDF to restrict itself to operations aimed at foiling actual terror attacks.

U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell told Sharon on Sunday that when he spoke with Arafat by telephone, the Palestinian leader pledged to continue working for a ceasefire. However, Powell added, the United States would continue to monitor Arafat's performance on the ground closely.

"We're not naive," Powell said, according to an Israeli source. "We expect not words... but action on the ground."

At a meeting with German Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer Sunday, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon called Arafat a "pathological liar" and said his talk of a ceasefire stemmed purely from fear of an Israeli reaction to Friday's bombing in Tel Aviv that killed 20 people. Sharon reiterated that Israel expects several specific actions from the PA – an end to incitement, an end to the violence and the rearrest of freed terrorists – and noted that so far, Arafat has taken no steps to clamp down on Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

IDF intelligence believes that Arafat's talk of a ceasefire is purely a short-term tactical manoeuvre. Its assessment is that Arafat will not call a permanent halt to the violence without a significant diplomatic achievement because he continues to see the violence as a tool for achieving his diplomatic ends.

The IDF is also uncertain as to how much the recent drop in the violence is really due to Arafat's ceasefire, because the number of shooting incidents frequently drops after a major terror attack as leading terrorists go underground for fear of an Israeli reprisal.

"We're not naive:" Colin Powell

"Nevertheless, perhaps this is the start of a positive process," said one IDF source. "Israel will try to encourage it... We will wait another few days to see if the Palestinians keep their promises."

But if Israel is skeptical about Arafat's intentions, there is general agreement that Jerusalem's restraint so far has reaped diplomatic dividends. Peres said last Sunday that Arafat's ceasefire declaration was the result of international pressure on the PA leader, which in turn was a direct result of Israel's restraint.

Fischer offered a similar assessment. The entire international community admires Israel's restraint, he said, and is urging Arafat to back up his words about a ceasefire with deeds. This, he said, is "the true red line," and if Arafat fails to act, the international community will hold him responsible.

Meanwhile, on Sunday, the IDF continued to implement measures approved by the cabinet in response to the Tel Aviv bombing. Private Palestinian vehicles were banned completely from Israeli-controlled roads in the territories yesterday, and additional roadblocks were set up around Palestinian villages. The eventual goal of these roadblocks is to divide the West Bank into eight regions, with no traffic permitted between them.

The army is also considering ways of beefing up security along the seamline between Israel and the territories. One possibility being considered is to declare a kilometre-wide strip of land east of the Green Line, along its entire length, a closed military zone, which would enable soldiers to arrest or even shoot at any Palestinian entering the area without permission. Another possibility is to set up special prisons for any Palestinian caught in Israel illegally, rather than simply returning them to the territories without penalty.

At the same time, the cabinet strongly condemned another response to the violence – anti-Arab rioting of the type that broke out after Friday's bombing. Sharon said such riots were "unacceptable" and urged the police to do everything in their power to prevent them in the future.

"These are things we must stop immediately, and not let them develop," he said.

Russia said on Sunday that it was sending a special envoy of its own to the region, ambassador-at-large Andrei Vdovin.

Arab media reported last Sunday that the person who committed Friday's suicide bombing was Said Khotari, 22, a Palestinian citizen of Jordan who has lived in Kalkilyah for the last two years. Security sources said they are checking this report, but believe it is probably accurate. They also said Khotari was apparently acting on behalf of Hamas.

attacks are concerned, however, Arafat has no influence whatsoever. The Islamic activists are totally opposed to the peace process and to the regime Arafat has established; thus, the only way Arafat can stop their activities is to throw them in jail or to help Israel eliminate them (which has been the practical meaning of Palestinian-Israeli co-ordination on security matters during the last few years).

One of Arafat's assistants explained last Sunday that the Israeli attacks on facilities and camps of the PA's security agencies have seriously disrupted, if not paralyzed, their operations. The members of these agencies have scattered and have found shelter in hiding places, warehouses and private apartments. It is impossible today to establish regular contact between the various units and districts, which are cut off from one another. In short, the PA can end the shooting and the violence only if it is able to operate as a properly functioning government; however, the PA is far from that situation today.

Judging from the way things looked last weekend, Arafat found it difficult to even declare a ceasefire. He did so only after pressure was exerted on him from every possible direction: from European and American diplomats, from several Arab leaders, even from members of the Labour party such as former justice minister Yossi Beilin who issued an urgent appeal for action on Arafat's part.

Pressure led to call for a ceasefire

In the end, the pressure led the Palestinian leader to issue a call for a ceasefire, although he made it clear that the shooting and violence would stop only after the initiation of a diplomatic process, which means implementation of the Mitchell Report's recommendations, adoption of the Egyptian-Jordanian initiative and a freeze on the settlements.

Nonetheless, for the first time since the bloody clashes began eight months ago, Arafat can see that some of his own people are showing a certain degree of interest in a ceasefire.

Members of his own Fatah movement and many Palestinians on the West Bank and in the Gaza Strip were shocked by the gruesome sights generated by last week's terrorist attack on a nightclub on Tel Aviv's beachfront. Some members of the PA leadership who appeared on the television stations of various Arab states criticized both the recent wave of suicide bombings and the attacks on civilians inside Israeli territory.

When there were a large number of Palestinian casualties and when Palestinians in the territories persistently called for retaliation and revenge, Arafat could not make the kind of statement he issued on Saturday regarding a cessation to the bloodshed. However, with many Palestinians visibly upset over the terror attack inside Israel and with the fears of a tough Israeli response, Arafat had a suitable backdrop for the statement.

Unfortunately, readiness for a ceasefire does not change the fact that a dead-end situation has prevailed in the territories since last September. Arafat's call for a ceasefire may thus turn out to be yet another worthless statement.

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The funeral last Friday of Faisal Husseini, the PLO official in charge of Palestinian affairs in Jerusalem, turned into a show of Palestinian national force, giving its 20,000 participants the sense of having liberated the eastern part of the capital from Israeli control for a few hours.

Young mourners destroyed dozens of police video cameras installed around the Old City, set ablaze a Jewish-owned store and chanted anti-Israeli slogans, but did not physically hurt anyone and avoided confrontation with the police forces that kept a watch over the events from a distance.

Senior Palestinian figures said Husseini's funeral procession was the largest in Arab East Jerusalem since his father's. His father, Abed al-Kader Husseini, was a Palestinian militia commander who died in the battle over the Kastel in Israel's War of Independence.

The procession began in Ramallah, to which Husseini's body had been brought from Jordan in a helicopter owned by King Abdullah. Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat accompanied the body from Jordan, together with other PA officials, and was the first to give a eulogy.

Husseini's coffin, draped in the Palestinian flag and flowers, was transported to Jerusalem by a Palestinian military vehicle after first circling the main square of Ramallah. The Israel Defence Forces allowed free passage not only to Husseini's coffin and the VIPs who accompanied it, but also the entire cortege of mourners, consisting of scores of vehicles.

Jerusalem police stopped traffic on the main road connecting the city centre and its northern neighbourhoods for two hours to allow the mourners to reach Orient House, the PLO's headquarters in East Jerusalem, for the pre-burial ceremony.

After the procession through East Jerusalem and the Old City, Husseini was buried at the Al-Aqsa Mosque cemetery.

Media's short-term memory

According to Reports

For some journalists memory is a very short-term affair. A little less than a year ago at Camp David, Israel and the Palestinians were tantalizingly close (at least theoretically) to reaching a historic compromise when Yasser Arafat rejected Ehud Barak's generous proposals. The only final status issues that were mentioned as separating the parties were Jerusalem and refugees. The question of settlements received hardly a mention because it was widely assumed that this matter was not only resolvable, but indeed that it had been resolved. (The Barak/Clinton initiative would have consolidated major settlement blocs close to the Green Line, leaving approximately 95 percent of the West Bank and Gaza Strip in Palestinian hands.) Even after the Palestinians turned to violence, and as talks continued at Taba in January, the settlements still were not an issue.

However, for some of the media, as those days have faded from view, so has the memory not only of what Arafat rejected but also of the fact that settlements were not the deal-breaker; they were not even an impediment to the peace talks. Indeed this fact demolished a long-held shibboleth, promoted in key media circles for years (for example, the highly influential Economist) that there could not be both settlements and peace.

Yet, we find today an intense return (especially in the Economist and in elements of the Canadian media) to this old refrain that the settlements are the principal impediment to peace. So insistent are some on this score that they've misrepresented the thrust of the recent Mitchell Commission Report, insisting that it linked an immediate halt to settlement activity with a halt to the violence, whereas in fact the report states clearly that the immediate cessation of violence (along with the Palestinians' resumption of security co-operation with Israel) is an unconditional first step to the implementation of confidence-building measures (including a halt to settlement activity).

Let us be clear: a substantial majority of Israelis have long been prepared for compromises to build trust and reach peace with the Palestinians. Prior to the release of the Mitchell Report, an opinion poll revealed that about 60 percent of Israelis favoured a formula under which a freeze on settlement activity would follow – but not be a condition for – a halt to Palestinian violence. This attitude is completely consistent with Mitchell's recommendations.

The CJN's editorial of May 24 pointed out that however one views settlements, to make them the issue "at the heart of the current violence" is to set up a "straw man." Tom Friedman in the New York Times (May 22), while highly critical of settlements (a matter also of considerable Israeli debate) went on to state correctly, "But the settlements are not the core problem. The core problem right now is Yasser Arafat… There is no Palestinian leader right now willing or able to say yes to a fair historic compromise."

Correction: In the May 31 column, the phrase "battling the occupation" should be read in place of "Israeli occupation" in the line beginning: "As Macdonald reports it…" The CBC's Neil Macdonald had claimed that the Palestinians were "battling the occupation" as if this were a fact. Yet since there are competing Israeli accounts of the Palestinian uprising, it is unfair for a journalist to report only the Palestinian version without qualifying, "as the Palestinians claim."

Bashar, chip off the old block

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Since the sudden death of Hafez Assad last June at the age of 69, Syria has been ruled by his son, Bashar, his hand-picked successor.

Although Assad the younger has pledged to modernize Syria through political and economic reforms, he has only tinkered with Syria's problems. Syria remains what it was for three decades under his father's iron-fisted hand: a dictatorial regime based on Alawite and Ba'athist party dominance.

Call his government, if you will, new wine in old bottles.

An ophthalmologist by profession, he was catapulted to power by virtue of his older brother's untimely death. Basil, Hafez Assad's first son and heir apparent, was killed in a car accident several years ago. With his demise, Bashar, now 35, was groomed to be Syria's next president.

Unlike Basil, Bashar has no resume to speak of, either in governance or military affairs. Today, he is receiving on-the-job training from essentially the same clique of trusted advisors who slavishly served his father: Foreign Minister Farouk al-Sharaa, Vice-President Abdel Halim Haddam and Defence Minister Mustafa Tlass.

Given his upbringing and his preference for continuity, it is hardly surprising that Assad, widely known as Dr. Bashar, has hewed rigidly to an anti-Israel agenda.

As it was under his father, the state-controlled media vilifies Israel as a colonialist usurper. But in recent months, Assad has sharpened the rhetoric considerably. None too subtly, he has described Israeli society as "more racist than Nazism." And in a foray into crude anti-Semitism last month, he compared "contemporary Zionists" with Jews (who) "betrayed Jesus Christ."

Though he claims that Israelis "have no desire to achieve peace with the Arabs," Assad has expressed an interest in reaching a comprehensive peace agreement with Israel, provided Israel withdraws to the pre-1967 frontiers and signs an end-of-conflict accord with the Palestinians.

Like his father, he allows Syria to be used as a conduit for the conveyance of Iranian arms to Hezbollah bases in southern Lebanon, vacated by Israel last May in a unilateral pullout sanctioned by the United Nations.

Despite its withdrawal, Israel maintained a grip on Shabaa Farms, a small area on the Golan Heights claimed by Lebanon. For the pastseven months, Hezbollah has launched pinprick attacks in Shabaa Farms in an attempt to seize it. Syria has supported these raids, which have claimed the lives of three Israeli soldiers.

Israel, having warned Assad it holds Syria responsible for Hezbollah's actions, bombed a Syrian radar station in Lebanon in mid-April. The bombing shocked Syria, but observers do not believe that Assad will order an end to Hezbollah's operations.

Similarly, Assad has no intention of shutting down the offices of radical Palestinian factions in Damascus, not even after the recent announcement by Ahmad Jibril that his organization masterminded an abortive shipment of weapons to the Palestinians in the Gaza Strip.

Assad's relationship with Yasser Arafat – president of the Palestinian Authority and chair of the PLO – is tenuous at best. Indeed, Arafat had to postpone a planned visit to Damascus after his refusal to accept a Syrian demand to abandon the Oslo peace process.

Despite Syria's deep, historic involvement in the Arab-Israeli dispute, Assad has concentrated on domestic issues. Syria is in dire need of wholesale reform, being weighed down by a repressive political system where human rights are merely a utopian concept and a stagnant economy riddled with corruption.

Assad, having said he wants to transform Syria, has taken several modest steps to revitalize the economy, encourage political debate and loosen press restrictions.

Yet the measures he has adoped have been limited and are subject to revision, and do not steer Syria toward a brave new world of genuine democracy.

Kalejs faces deportation to Latvia

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It seems no matter which Western democracy he tries, Konrad Kalejs cannot find an accommodating home.

Last week, an Australian court ordered that Kalejs be extradited to his country of origin, Latvia, where he will face war crimes charges connected to his role as commander of the exterior guard at the Salaspils police and labour camp.

Kalejs was jailed following the decision, but the 87-year-old Australian citizen was released three hours later when he was granted bail by a Federal Court pending appeal of the extradition order.

For Kalejs, an officer with the wartime Arajs Kommando, getting thrown out has become a familiar routine. During the 1990s, he was expelled from the United States, Canada and Britain, always ending up in Australia, where he had become a citizen in 1959.

In 1997, a Canadian Immigration adjudicator ruled Kalejs participated in war crimes as commander of the outside guard at the Salaspils concentration camp. At the time, Kalejs was living in Canada as a visitor. He was whisked away to the airport following the adjudicator's decision, after making a brief stop at his home to pack his bags.

Though only a visitor, Kalejs had purchased a condominium on Yonge Street in north Toronto. He told the immigration hearing he planned to stay an indeterminate length of time – as long as it took to clear his name in the United States, which had deported him earlier.

Ironically, the north Toronto condominium was also home to many Jews, including several Holocaust survivors, who campaigned vigorously to get him out of the building. Two of Kalejs' former neighbours called The CJN to express their satisfaction that Kalejs would finally face trial in his native Latvia, where he had been an early recruit to a Nazi collaborationist organization that participated in the murder of 30,000 Jews.

Evidence in Australia suggested that as many as six prisoners were shot while attempting to escape Salaspils during the period Kalejs was in command.

Lawyers representing Latvia also told the Australian hearing that Kalejs ordered guards to shoot escaping prisoners; that he "embraced Nazism"; and that he facilitated the inhumane treatment of prisoners at the camp, an Australian news agency reported.

Kalejs has denied the allegations against him.

Lawyers representing Kalejs in Australia argued the proceedings against their client were unjust. Kalejs suffers from dementia, is legally blind and partially deaf and was unable to follow proceedings, his lawyers stated. He was accompanied to the Melbourne Magistrates court by a nurse pushing his wheelchair.

Jewish leaders welcomed the Australia court decision. Efraim Zuroff, representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Jerusalem, pointed out that until the Kalejs case, Australia had failed to take successful legal action against a single Nazi war criminal. He noted that if the extradition is completed, the Kalejs case would mark the first trial of a local Nazi collaborator in a former Soviet republic.

The Wiesenthal Centre located Kalejs in a British nursing home in 1999, after which he was forced to return to Australia. Kalejs has been living in a Latvian nursing home in Melbourne.

Jack Silverstone, executive vice-president and general counsel of Canadian Jewish Congress, said "it in entirely appropriate that at the end of his life, Kalejs will be called to the bar of justice in the place where his heinous crimes were committed."

Spousal emotional abuse called continuing problem

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There is a lack of consciousness about spousal emotional abuse in the Jewish community, says Rabbi Larry Pinsker of Darchei Noam Congregation.

Emotional abuse, which can be verbal or non-verbal, is a continuing human problem that has gone on for thousands of years, he said at a recent adult education panel sponsored by the synagogue.

Also on the panel was Debby Feldman, supervisor of the women's abuse program at Jewish Family & Child Services.

The source of the notion that people are entitled to a life free of abuse is the Torah, said Rabbi Pinsker. "The very principle stems from a short passage that says 'You are not to hate your brother in your heart.'"

The notion that it is possible to refrain from emotional abuse is built into the fabric of the Torah, he said, but the instrument of ending that behaviour is complex.

"Every ethical text teaches that restraint is necessary. Speech must be used to encourage and uplift others, not to cause pain. If you love other people, it is the same as loving God."

It is worse to humiliate someone than it is to steal from them, said Rabbi Pinsker. "The damage done to a person with words can never be undone... There is no compromise on human dignity.

"The Zohar says that one dare not demean another human being, for to do so is to destroy the world," he said.

Feldman said that an emotionally abusive spouse – usually the man – intimidates the other person in an attempt to control. There is a power imbalance.

Emotional abuse is not taken seriously enough, she said. "One study says that being ridiculed can have greater impact on a person [than being physically harmed.]"

Victims of emotional abuse are at great risk of suicide, she said. "They are often isolated because their partner prevents them from having friends or going to work.

"The perpetrator acts over-jealous, and criticizes his partner's cooking, cleaning or mothering. He often threatens his wife with punishment if she does not comply [with his demands.]"

Women stay in such relationships, said Feldman, because it is difficult to find support in the community. "Women who have been emotionally abused often find that their experiences are minimized.

"Some women do not know where to turn, and others have become impassive or defenceless after years of abuse. Jewish women stay in abusive situations longer than other women because they may feel they are letting down the community by [breaking up their home]. She may not want to admit her perfect marriage is a myth.

"Some women stay at home because they are afraid they will lose their children, and others are brainwashed [into believing] that they cannot get along without their husbands."

We can help an abused woman by listening to her and believing her said Feldman. "Respect her right to confidentiality, and let her know you are concerned. [Acknowledge] that emotional abuse can have as much impact as physical violence.

"Don't blame her or make excuses for her partner. Abuse is a behavioural response used to gain control over another person," said Feldman.

Ask the woman what she needs, but do not take over, she said. "She has had enough of that. Help her to recognize her strength and make her feel good about herself. Gather community resources and present her with them.

"Respect her decisions. There are many complexities in the situation. Women who leave their home often return a few times before their decision is final. Leaving a relationship is complicated, and we have no right to judge anyone."

Stroke recovery program to hold 22nd banquet

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When Sally Sherman first came to the stroke recovery program at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC), she couldn't speak at all.

Now she can say a few words, and she can lift her arm above her head.

Her caregiver, Themis Pierides, who speaks four languages, is enthusiastic about the progress she has made.

This is just one success story.

Sherman, along with some 25 other members of the program, will be at its 22nd anniversary banquet June 27 at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

Unique in Toronto, the program offers physical and social activities for people who have had strokes and would otherwise be isolated from any contact with others. It meets Monday, Wednesday and Friday mornings in the Jerusalem Room for physical exercises. Pool exercises and therapy are given on Fridays.

When The CJN visited one Monday recently, the group members all wanted to be sure that the volunteer leaders were given credit for the good work they do. "This is like a family; everyone helps everyone else," said Swartz.

The group is open to everyone and referrals come from hospitals and agencies. About one-third of the participants are non-Jewish, and the feeling of diversity is underlined by their greetings to each other in a dozen different languages.

"We don't offer any promises to people that they'll get rid of their disability," said Janis Roth, director of community and family services.

"What we offer is a chance for them to remain active and maintain their place in their community."

Sheila Gibbert of South Africa, who can now walk by herself with a cane, says she likes coming to the group, as do Dorothy Mills and Elma Monaghan. The latter, who has been attending for a year, says she can now walk without even using a cane.

Shirley Goldman has been coming for two years, and despite having suffered a mini-stroke after the main one, enjoys the meetings and is progressing.

After eight years, Bill Mahon, is one of the veterans and earns a light-hearted comment from volunteer Swartz, who said that "he is more ornery than ever." Mahon said he likes being with the others who have had strokes, and his attendant, Willy Lovensohn, a Romanian Jew, heartily agreed.

"There is no other group like this," said Maurice Rabinovitch, unofficial secretary, who attends with his wife, Miriam, who suffered a stroke. "It is wonderful how much these people enjoy getting together," he said.

The annual dinner is an event the members await eagerly. They pay only $18 for a gourmet dinner, open bar and musical entertainment at the banquet, which is arranged by volunteers Swartz and Weinper who raise funds independently to pay for it.

BJCC members pay a fee of $75 a year and non-members pay an initial fee of $25 and $25 for any other part of the program, physical or social.

The United Way helps to fund the program.

The Mooncatchers
a folktale from Eastern Europe

Every person who lived in the imaginary town of Chelm — not to be confused with the real town in Poland also called Chelm — was a fool. Join us as we find out how the Chelmites solve their lighting problem.

The Chelmites were tired of bumping into trees on cloudy nights. "That's enough!" they decided "We need a way to light this town up at night!"

A committee was quickly appointed to find a solution.

They met that night by the deli. As everyone munched on pickles from a big barrel, Chaim had a brainstorm. "Why don't we catch the moon?" he exclaimed. "That would light the town up at night!"

"Good idea," said Shmerel, finishing a pickle, "but how do we get it down here?"

Chaim didn't answer. He was reaching all the way into the barrel to get the very last pickle.

"Well," repeated Shmerel, as Chaim came up again with his pickle, "how do we catch it?"

The committee went silent as they pondered what to do.

"Hey, look!" yelled Tuvia. "Look in the barrel!" They looked and saw the moon shimmering in the briny water of the pickle barrel!

"The moon fell in!"

"Quickly, catch it!"

They hurriedly slammed the lid down on the barrel, trapping the moon inside. Then they went into the deli to get something to drink. Eating a lot of pickles can make a person thirsty. The next day they reported their success.

The next few nights were dark and cloudy. "Why isn't there any moonlight?" wondered the Chelmites. But then they remembered: "We have the moon! Let's use it!" They dragged the barrel into the middle of the town, and joyously opened it.

But there was no light. They looked in the barrel. The moon was gone!

"Oy," screamed Chaim. "We didn't leave the moon any food! It must have starved to death!"

"Oy vey," mourned the Chelmites. In the darkness they sadly returned to their homes, bumping into trees along the way.

My Mannequins

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

What do you do when you come home from school? Do you have a snack and then watch TV? Do homework? Play sports? Take dance or music or gymnastics lessons?

That's what most kids do these days. But when your grandparents (and some of your parents) were your age, they often helped in their family's business.

That's what Dora did, in Sydell Waxman's new book My Mannequins (Napoleon Publishing, 2000, with illustrations by Patty Gallinger).

Dora's father made ladies' dresses in a shop on Spadina Avenue in the Kensington Market area of Toronto, where most of the Jews in Toronto lived before they started to move up Bathurst Street.

After school, she would come to the shop and make the boxes that her father needed to ship the dresses that were made there. After the shop closed, while her father did paperwork, she made more boxes or played.

One thing that always bothered Dora was that the dresses were very "plain and simple and dark." She used to look at the mannequins in the window (mannequins are the figures that clothing stores use to show people the outfits for sale) and dream: "Someday, I'll give you outfits that sparkle. Shimmering scarves. Ribbons. Rickrack. Sequins," she thought. She would become Dora the Designer.

One evening, the mannequins looked especially sad, Dora thought. Her father wasn't paying attention, so she found scraps of different coloured cloth and sequins and tassels and dressed the mannequins up. Before she had a chance to show her father, or to change them back to the way they had been, her father insisted that they had to go home.

She was really worried about what her father would say when he got to the shop the next morning. (Well, wouldn't you be?) She couldn't wait to get there after school.

To her father's (and her) surprise, people walking by loved Dora's creations. She had really become Dora the Designer.

At the end of the book, Sydell Waxman adds a historical note, that talks about the clothing business in the early part of the 20th century and explains why so many newcomers to Canada worked in it.

Rubin remembered for her preservation of Yiddish

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

Renowned Yiddish folklorist Ruth Rubin, who died about a year ago, devoted her life to the collection and preservation of Yiddish folklore.

On June 12, the Toronto Jewish community will devote the evening to celebrating her life and work.

"European Jews living in the 19th century produced thousands of songs. These songs are an important part of our heritage but many had been lost," explains Naomi Bell, a folksinger and ethnomusicologist who was deeply inspired by Rubin's work, and will be performing at the tribute in a style she believes Rubin would have liked.

"Ruth Rubin made a tremendous contribution to the preservation of our heritage," says Bell.

Over the course of four decades Rubin compiled a collection of about 2,000 Yiddish folksongs which she learned by shlepping a tape recorder to the homes of Jewish Eastern European immigrants living in North America.

She also recorded five albums, wrote many articles, and three books, including Voices of a People: The Story of the Yiddish Folksong, and gave lectures and recitals in an effort to preserve a vanishing cultural tradition.

One of the first women in the United States to become a prominent folklorist, Rubin helped succeeding generations learn about the beauty, wisdom, wit and creativity of Yiddish folk culture by exploring the origins and background of the songs, which were originally sung in domestic settings almost exclusively by women.

"She understood that these songs reflected [Jewish] history and culture – they're not just pretty little songs," says Bell.

Asked to elaborate on Rubin's contribution to Jewish culture, Marks explains that Rubin "wanted to share this wonderful heritage that we have and transmit it through song.

"Ruthie gave back Jewish culture to the Jewish people by translating Yiddish folksongs into English so more people could understand them."

Part of the beauty of Rubin's work was that she sang a capella, "the way it must have been sung originally," says Marks, adding that at her recitals, Rubin was able to take on the persona of the people in the song, thereby interpreting the emotions embedded in the music.

Born to Russian Jewish immigrants on Sept.1, 1906 in Montreal, Yiddish was Rubin's first language.

At age 18 she moved to New York City, and by the time she was 20, she had published a volume of Yiddish poetry. During World War II she studied under Yiddish scholar Max Weinreich, then director of YIVO, the Jewish Research Institute, and translated diaries smuggled out of ghettos and concentration camps.

After the war she began to intensely research Jewish folklore in an attempt to recover the culture the Nazis had destroyed

Rubin earned a Ph.D from Union Graduate School in Cleveland when she was 70 years old, completing her dissertation on the songs of Jewish women.

Included among her many honours are YIVO's Lifetime Achievement Award and Jewish Currents publication's M.S. Arnoni Award. She died in June 2000 at the age of 93.

The tribute to Rubin will be held at Temple Sinai beginning at 7:30 p.m. and features special tributes by Marks, and Ben Steinberg, composer and scholar. There will also be musical performances by Bell; Ruth Slater, a cantor and folksinger; and Jerry Gray of The Travellers.

As well, A Life of Song: A Portrait of Ruth Rubin will be shown in its first Toronto public screening.

Voices of a People, the 2000 edition, will be available for purchase at the event.

Award-winning director known for eclectic tastes

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although Martin Lavut claims he is no fan of science films, his latest documentary, After Darwin, is a model of the genre.

"I tried to make it as pleasant an experience as possible," said Lavut, a prize-winning director.

It appears that he has succeeded. Broadcast recently across Canada on the Discovery Channel, After Darwin won this year's Gemini Award for best science documentary program.

Shot on location in Canada, the United States, Britain and China, After Darwin contends that humans stand on the threshold of a biotechnology revolution that will probably change society as fundamentally as the ongoing information revolution.

Five years in the making, it predicts that advances in biotechnology, triggered by new discoveries in the human genetic code, will inevitably increase our understanding of the mysteries of life.

"The implications of genetic engineering are profound," said Lavut, adding that one of its positive spinoffs could be the eradication of Tay Sachs, a rare genetic disease that affects Ashkenazi Jews.

Lavut acknowledged that genetic engineering could be a negative force in the wrong hands. For better or worse, though, it is an irresistible force.

A Montrealer now living in Toronto, Lavut has been a filmmaker for more than three decades.

Originally an actor, he is known for his eclectic tastes. As a documentarian, he has profiled communications guru Marshall McLuhan and plumbed the depths of geometry. As a director of television dramas, he has produced films ranging from Charley Grant's War to Palais Royale.

He made his first movie, a CBC TV biopic of Nazi-era film director Leni Riefenstahl, in 1965.

Before his foray into the movie business, Lavut studied acting at the Pasadena Playhouse in California and spent a year at Sir George Williams University in Montreal.

The son of Louis and Belle Lavut, he grew up in Montreal's Cote des Neiges district, and graduated from Montreal High School.

In the early 1960s when he was honing his acting career, Lavut won the lead role in a CBC adaptation of Mordecai Richler's novel, The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz.

Less auspiciously, he appeared in what he describes as "one of the worst 10 movies" ever made, The Mask.

Torontonian interviews Clinton for TV documentary

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

TORONTO — For Fern Levitt, interviewing former U.S. president Bill Clinton for The Little Rock Nine, her latest documentary, was the highlight of her career thus far.

"I just couldn't believe I was sitting in his home and speaking to him," she says. "I asked the questions I had prepared, but just kept saying to myself, 'I am speaking to President Clinton.' "

After a rocky, uncertain ride, Levitt finally got the interview with Clinton, and says she was overwhelmed when she went to his New York home in March.

Clinton agreed to work with Levitt because he admires and respects the nine people whom the documentary is about, and is even close personal friends with some of them.

"He also believes the story should never be forgotten," says Levitt. "It needs to be told and Clinton and I knew that if he was in the documentary, it would attract a wider audience."

But her work, and this documentary in particular, is not just significant because of the celebrity appearance.

The Little Rock Nine, which airs on the History Channel on June 11 as part of the series, Turning Points in History, is about nine courageous black students who stood up to segregated schooling by enrolling in an all-white high school in Arkansas, in 1957.

Orville Faubus, then governor of the state, sent in the National Guard to prevent the students from attending. President Dwight Eisenhower responded soon thereafter to this violation of constitutional rights by calling in the 101 Airborne. While the troops accompanied the students to school, they were unable to protect the nine from the verbal and even physical abuse they endured incessantly throughout the year.

"The Little Rock Nine helped end segregation in schools in the U.S.," says Levitt, who wanted to do the film for five years before finally getting the OK from the History Channel.

"These students showed incredible courage and determination. They endured everything to make a difference, and not one of them quit," says Levitt admiringly.

"They're heroes and role models, and segregation would have lasted a lot longer had it not been for them."

Levitt also had personal reasons for wanting to tell the story.

"As a kid I remember seeing footage of Elisabeth [one of the nine] walking to school," she explains. "The mob yelled insults at her and spat on her to the point where her dress was drenched, and I was disgusted at how all those people had no feelings for what they were doing to other humans."

The story was also important for her to tell as a Jew.

"I feel strongly about racism and the Holocaust," Levitt says. "The Holocaust is a human tragedy, not just a Jewish tragedy, and I think Jews and blacks have similar histories. I feel angry about what happened to the Jews, and I feel for blacks too."

Raised in Hamilton, Ont. in a middle class neighbourhood, Levitt graduated from York University with a degree in psychology, and earned a master of science in social work at the University of Toronto. As a social worker, Levitte worked with Holocaust survivors, but was unsatisfied with that career.

She says she got into film because of her husband, Arnie Zipursky, of 18 years, who owns the film company, Cambium.

"His life just seemed more interesting than mine, and storytelling... just comes easy to me," she says, adding that her grandmother and mother are great storytellers.

After a stint as a researcher for TVOntario, she began her career as a freelance director, and has been directing documentaries for 10 years now.

Levitt and her husband directed Each of Us Has a Name, a documentary that follows two Holocaust survivors and Canadian children as they travel through Poland on the March of the Living.

The couple is also going to be working on a movie and documentary about the story of Judy Feld Carr, a Torontonian who played a significant role in rescuing the Jews of Syria in the 1970s and '80s.

Levitt says she makes films about the experiences of Jews and blacks so viewers "can learn about racism and the impact it has on victims."

A mother of three girls, Levitt says she teaches them about racism, and wants viewers to be aware of the issue as well.

"If I can leave viewers with a message, it is to to respect all human beings. We need to learn from our history so it doesn't repeat itself."

In the future, Levitt says she wants to be doing exactly what she does now, but on June 11, she'll be at home in Toronto watching The Little Rock Nine.

THE EDISON MUSEUM IN VIENNA, ONT.

TRAVEL TALK
BY BILL GLADSTONE

Six kilometres above the northeastern shore of Lake Erie, the sleepy hamlet of Vienna, Ont., boasts a strong connection with the family of Thomas Alva Edison (1847-1931), the legendary American inventor, who might have been born Canadian but for a quirk of fate.

Four generations of Edisons lived in Vienna, including the inventor's parents, Nancy and Samuel Edison, Jr., and Thomas Alva spent many summers here as a child, visiting his grandfather. Some 40 Edison family members are buried in local cemeteries and, until recent decades, numerous cousins lived in the area.

Edison's inventions included the lightbulb, the phonograph, the electric battery, the automotive sparkplug, the movie camera and sprocketed movie film. He filed 1,024 patents in his 84 years. Vienna's Edison Museum, which occupies an 1853 two-storey farmhouse, offers many intriguing artifacts and displays related to his many inventions.

Several rooms contain period furniture, including some pieces once owned by the Edisons. An antique clock on the mantel was an anniversary gift that the inventor's grandfather, Captain Samuel Edison, Sr., purchased in New York. The walls and tables bear photographs of the inventor and his kin.

Several rooms display phonographs and other Edison devices. Display cases hold numerous odd-shaped bulbs, batteries, phonograph needles and old books about Edison.

Cindy Franklin, a member of the museum's board, winds the crank of an Edison-brand phonograph machine and slides the needle onto the nearly imperceptible grooves of an Edison-brand bakelite cylinder. Tinny music from the 1920s pours from the megahorn.

Next, Franklin illuminates an electric lightbulb from the early 20th century. It instantly glows with light. Still in excellent condition, the filament is made of bamboo, one of many natural substances with which Edison experimented.

An upstairs bedroom, styled as a ladies' sewing room, is supposedly haunted. One evening, a board meeting in the parlour was interrupted by "a lot of noises, like scraping and bumping" coming from above, Franklin relates. The board never returned to the house at night and the tale became part of the museum's well-treasured lore.

The Edison connection to Vienna begins with John Edison, Thomas Alva's great-grandfather, a United Empire Loyalist who left the United States after the Revolutionary War and settled with his family in Digby, N.S., in the 1780s. In 1811, already an old man, he and several of his married children and their families trailblazed into the largely unsettled area above Lake Erie known as the Talbot Settlement.

The inventor's grandfather, Samuel Edison, Sr., became a captain in the War of 1812 and was later given the honour of naming the town. The inventor's father, Samuel Edison, Jr., was an outspoken supporter of William Lyon Mackenzie's failed rebellion of 1837, and later fled Upper Canada in fear for his life. The family moved to Milan, Ohio, where Thomas Alva was born in 1847.

The decade in which the boy spent his summers in Vienna was reportedly the grandest the town would ever know. In the 1850s, at the height of the lumber boom, Vienna boasted a population estimated as high as 5,000, or roughly 10 times its present 500. Only a few historic buildings remain, including the United and Anglican churches, and a library that dates from 1862.

Admission to the Edison Museum (519-886-5521) is $2 for adults, free for children. Vienna is about 25 km south of Tillsonburg along Highway 19 ("Plank Road"). Vienna's Web site is www. library.elgincounty.on.ca/vilib/index.html.

About six kilometres south of Vienna is the lakeside village of Port Burwell (population 1,000) which retains many good century homes, Canada's oldest wooden lighthouse (erected 1840) and other structures. The Port Burwell Marine Museum recalls the region's rich seafaring with many nautical souvenirs and models.

Putting this fiasco behind him, Lavut emerged as a film director with his biography of Riefenstahl, the creator of the classic Triumph of the Will, an ode to a 1934 Nazi party rally in Nuremberg, Germany.

Was she a Nazi and an anti-Semite? Lavut doesn't know, but at the very least Riefenstahl was an opportunist who would have worked for Winston Churchill instead of Adolf Hitler had circumstances been different.

In any case, he said, she was "shocked and appalled" by the Holocaust.

Years later, Lavut directed the CBC production of Charley Grant's War, the true story of an idealistic Canadian who helped Jews escape from Nazi-occupied Austria.

"It was as good as it could be, given the material and the budget," he said somewhat cryptically.

Since Charley Grant's War, Lavut's directing credits have included The Marriage Bed, Maggie and Pierre, War Brides, ENG and The Twilight Zone.

"Outside of documentaries, the films I have done have come out of laziness," he confessed. "I was offered certain things, and I did them."

Currently, Lavut is in the process of casting his newest film, a feature about a boys' school in Canada. He wrote the script and will direct it.

Sing-Along Screening of Fiddler On The Roof

Attendees to an upcoming sing-along screening of Fiddler on the Roof are being encouraged to "dress up as your favourite character – babushkas, beards and wedding veils" with prizes offered for best costumes.

Host David Gale, an actor, comedian, singer and fitness instructor, leads the vocal warm-up and explains the contents of the interactive kit that all participants receive at the door.

June 13, 7 p.m., Bloor Cinema. $25 from Bloor JCC until June 13; $30 at the door. 416-924-6211.

Holocaust Drama Honoured: A Holocaust drama has taken top honours in this year's Canadian Jewish Playwriting Contest, the Jewish Theatre Committee of Toronto has announced.

The winning play is Sara's Cave, by Don Molnar, which pits a Righteous Gentile against the Nazi murder machine. For the first time, the winner of the annual playwriting competition was to be announced at the Canadian Jewish Book Awards, June 6 at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

The prize for winning entries in the annual contest is $500, plus a professionally-directed staged reading of the work. This year the committee considered 14 entries, says committee chair Ralph Wintrob.

"There were a lot of highly polished scripts on a wide variety of themes. That made the selection process long and difficult."

Sara's Cave "addressed the themes powerfully and directly," Wintrob said. "The play touched us all with its emotional depth and the strength of the moral conflicts. That has often been the compelling deciding factor over the years with the contest. The Holocaust theme just seems to trump the competition."

Yiddish Film Classic: The Toronto Jewish Film Society continues its 23rd season with a screening of The Singing Blacksmith, featuring legendary actor Moishe Oysher as Yankl. The story, which focuses on a happy marriage threatened by Yankl's attraction for his neighbour, is based on a 1906 play by David Pinski.

The film, which is in Yiddish with English subtitles, offers a panoramic and original view of shtetl life. The Society is screening a brand new 35mm print that has been lovingly restored by the National Center for Jewish Film. It will be introduced by writer-translator Shirley Kumove, compiler of the collections of Yiddish sayings, Words Like Arrows and More Words Like Arrows.

Art Gallery of Ontario, Jackman Hall. Screenings are Sunday June 10, 5:15 p.m. (limited seating) and 7:45 p.m. Tickets available 15 minutes prior to screenings. $8. For details please call the Bloor JCC, 416-924-6211.

The lighter side of being lonely

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Loneliness as a comedy? Not many will agree, but director Leah Cherniak does, and adds that even though she doesn't approach loneliness as a comedy, she thinks people are too embarrassed to talk about it, and they shouldn't be.

"Loneliness is so common and we shouldn't just cast it away," said Cherniak, who is directing Lonely Nights & Other Stories, opening at Factory Theatre June 7 and running until July 1.

"It's OK to be lonely and it's OK for us to do a play about it."

It is a collective effort by Cherniak and a cast of five, including Martha Ross, co-artistic director with Cherniak of Theatre Columbus.

A weird bunch of characters, all of them lonely for one reason or another, inhabit this 105-minute production with no intermission.

"Collective writing is very painful," Cherniak said. "We just don't sit and write, we get up frequently and talk to each other."

The play took the collective three years to finish, with the group getting together for a few weeks at a time every year, "whenever we could afford it and get everybody together."

Cherniak thinks a collective produces a different but not a better play than a single playwright does, and said she does not prefer one over the other.

The daughter of Ruth and Jack Cherniak, formerly of Saskatoon and Winnipeg, she has had a distinguished career, including directing The Anger in Ernest and Ernestine, produced 21 times across Canada and the United States, in Prague and Adelaide, Australia, and in Havana, in a Spanish translation.

Asked if Ernest and Ernestine is her favourite play, she replied: "I'm very fond of it, but every theatre experience is special."

Lonely Nights, a collection of short stories that give a panoramic view of loneliness, reminds Cherniak of Betrayal, a play she also directed, which won five Dora awards in 1998. This also had its comic side, she said, even though it dealt with adultery.

In Lonely Nights, Oliver Dennis, Maggie Huculak, Ross, Michael Simpson and Ker Wells portray, among others, a woman in a mid-life love crisis, an ex-con, a beyond-middle-age virgin, a misanthrope and a vacuum salesperson.

"They are vulnerable, awkward and lonely people who will magically make you laugh through your tears," Cherniak said.

A graduate of the University of Toronto, Cherniak studied for two years in Paris at L'École Jacques Lecoq.

"This is where I began to understand the kind of theatre I was destined to do. At one level at least I have stayed faithful to it," she said.

Theatre Columbus has had to rent a rehearsal hall for seven weeks to do Lonely Nights, because it no longer has a home of its own, although it does maintain an office.

For tickets, call the Factory Theatre box office, 416 504-9971, and for more information, call Theatre Columbus, 416 504-0019.

Business Profile

Levy brothers' toys encourage creative thinking

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Without the slightest fanfare, the brothers launched their business in 1984, riding the crest of a somewhat piddling $40,000 investment.

And now, 17 years later, Jonathan Levy and his older brother, Andy, co-founders of Mastermind Educational, have reason to be pleased and optimistic.

Their specialty toy store chain, consisting of nine airy shops in the greater Toronto area, has blossomed into one of the largest chains of its kind in Canada.

"We started quite humbly," acknowledged Jonathan.

Jonathan had to sell his car and Andy had to dip into his savings to establish Mastermind Educational, whose stores range in size from 4,000 to 6,000 square feet.

At first, they sold only children's computer programs, but soon they branched into puzzles and books. "We opened our second store in 1985, and that's when we started blending a broader mix of products," said Jonathan.

Nearly two decades later, each of their kid-friendly stores carries about 6,000 items, ranging from wooden train sets and dolls to craft kits and board games.

Mastermind Educational, with 250 employees, cannot and does not compete with mammoths like Toys "R" Us or Wal-Mart, which dominate the toy market.

Instead, the Levys focus on the specialty retail sector, and concentrate on higher quality, trend-proof toys that, as they are fond of saying, encourage curiosity and challenge thinking.

It has been a winning formula. In 1999, Mastermind Educational won the Canadian toy industry's prize for best retailer.

Concentrating on a line of merchandise usually not found in the much bigger chains, the Levys try to select goods that awaken creativity, enhance motor skills, develop imagination, offer fun and stand the test of time, all of which, they point out, translates into more value for money.

"We're special because we take a very organized and professional approach to what, typically, has been an unsophisticated business," said Jonathan.

Jonathan Levy (right) and his brother, Andy.

"Western Europe – Sweden, England, Germany, Denmark, France, Italy – is the heart of the better-made toy," explained Jonathan, citing fine wooden train sets, beautifully-crafted dolls, Lego building blocks, Ravensberger puzzles and Quercetti math games.

From China, the Levys import baby toys and soft cuddly toys. From Japan and the United States, they purchase science kits, Radio Flyer wagons, a medley of outdoor toys and an immense variety of books for toddlers, children and parents alike.

And from Canadian manufacturers, they acquire, among other things, craft kits, paint-and-decorate ceramics, plasticine and helmets.

"People come to our stores because of the selection and dependability of our products," said Jonathan. "We review our toys very thoroughly, we do not carry violent toys, and we respond to customers' feedback."

Surprising though it may be, they do not stock custom-made toys. "We're not toy developers, although we've discussed it. Some companies have gotten into trouble doing this."

Mastermind Educational is strictly a family affair.

Jonathan, 38, is the head buyer. Andy, 45, tends to financial, leasing and personnel matters.

Jonathan's wife, Karyn, the mother of a four-year-old and a six-year-old, oversees merchandising, and has been in the business for 12 years. Ari Levy, Jonathan's second cousin, is in charge of distribution and the computer system.

"This arrangement works really, really well."

As chief buyer, Jonathan is usually on the road for six to eight weeks from January to April, attending the International Toy Fair in New York City and toy shows in Hong Kong and Nuremberg, Germany. He also visits hobby and craft exhibitions in the United States.

"I look for the unique twist in a toy, and I'm interested in the smallest detail," he explained. "I'm also hands-on. When I buy a ball, I like to bounce it. When I buy a kite, I like to fly it."

He is particularly careful when it comes to buying dolls. First and foremost, he looks for quality of construction. "A doll has to stand up to a tremendous amount of wear and tear."

Beyond durability, a doll must pass several other critical tests to satisfy Levy's exacting standards. "There must be a gentleness of expression. It should be cleaned with ease. The hair should be brushed easily and look nice."

At a glance, he can invariably spot a winning piece of merchandise. Yet he has made his share of miscalculations. "I'm pretty far from perfect."

A graduate of Lawrence Park Collegiate in Toronto, Levy enjoyed tinkering with mechanical devices when he was a boy.

And he was instinctively entrepreneurial, following in his dad's footsteps. Edward Levy, his father, was a member of the family that founded Levy Auto Parts, which was eventually sold.

Recalling his childhood, Levy said, "I always had a business, whether it was shovelling snow from driveways or buying and selling cars. I always had something on the go."

When he and Andy came up with the idea for Mastermind Educational, they resolved not to seek family help. The first few years were characterized by uncertainty and upheaval, but they were confident of their abilities.

"I always envisioned success, but I didn't realize how much time and patience it would take for the business to flourish."

As for the future, he envisages cross-Canada expansion.

"In 10 years from now," he said, "we'll be a national chain, with very strong local roots."

Comforting the bereaved

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rituals and stories can be an "exquisite comfort" to bereaved families, says Leonard Fein, a writer, teacher and social activist whose own daughter died suddenly when she was 30 years old.

"[No matter what] the rituals, it relieves the [bereaved] of responsibility. Prayers are there for you."

Fein, author of Against the Dying of the Light, a book about his struggle to understand the sudden death of his daughter Nomi in 1996, spoke publicly for the first time about her death at the recent Lawrence and Frances Bloomberg Spring Author's lecture at Holy Blossom Temple.

"Each loss is unique, but it is not unique. Countless others have suffered losses. The comfort is that countless others have gone on with their lives," said Fein, who has taught at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Brandeis University.

He is founder of Moment magazine, an independent magazine of Jewish affairs, and MAZON: A Jewish Response to Hunger, of which there are Canadian chapters in Toronto and Montreal.

Writing his book, he said, was his way to grieve. "Writing it was bitter-sweet. Each time I sat down to write, it brought up her memories."

After a loved one dies, he said, "you know your life will never be the same, but neither is it over. There is work to be done, and there are others to nurture and to discover. There is also wonder and laughter and art.

"Even if we are allowed a week-long absence from the stage, we cannot escape the play," he said.

There is a lot of talk these days about closure, he said, "but how do you put closure to your loss? In Nomi's case there was no one to blame for her death, but if there was someone to blame, would a conviction offer me closure? Hardly."

Closure is not appropriate, he said. "The essential nature of this kind of loss is that it endures. We live with it constantly, and we grieve for good and sufficient reasons.

"Grief changes, but I will [always] grieve. I will not rush to place grief in a cupboard to take out on ritual occasions."

Fein said that he is not an expert on death. "Perhaps those who work with terminally ill patients have a greater understanding, but that is only an understanding of the act of dying, not on being dead. Death remains virtually incomprehensible."

Nothing is more incomprehensible, said Fein, than unsequenced death – the death of a child. "A radical disorientation forces us to examine what it means to be dead.

"Death is forever, yet we cannot understand what forever is. Forever is infinity, and infinity is not the end. It is the end plus one. Nothing that we know prepares us to handle forever, yet that is precisely what death is about," he said.

There are clashes between what we understand and what we experience about death, "and that accounts for doctrines of resurrection. If people imagine a soul that survives or a body that rises, and takes comfort from that, so be it. I will not quarrel."

No God wills the death of an innocent, said Fein. "God is not an interventionist. [If so,] how could God have failed to intervene during the years of the Holocaust?

"In theory, numbers do not matter. One by one, we are all of concern to him, [but] God does not translate that concern into action.

"Nomi and I had agreed that we experience God through our relationships with others. If death lies beyond our understanding, [what else] can we hold on to?"

Rhodes Scholar learning the ropes of British soccer

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — England may be the birthplace of soccer, but at the University of Oxford, it ranks no higher than fourth in popularity among team sports.

Rowing, rugby and – can you believe it? – cricket all have higher profiles on campus, says Irv Studin, a midfielder on the school's soccer squad.

Studin, a Rhodes Scholar who's spent the last two years at Oxford, has been impressed with the kind of support the fourth sport gets.

Despite its underprivileged status, the soccer team still manages to attract top-level coaches, including former professionals whose knowledge of the game, technical skill and prestige make their Canadian counterparts pale by comparison.

Gianluca Vialli, a former Italian international and coach of English first division team Chelsea, coached the Oxford squad for a time this season. Another coach had led Sunderland to a FA Cup final.

"At the time, we had three coaches who, to put it mildly, were better than anything you could get in North America, maybe even at the professional level," Studin said. "They bring legitimacy, experience, analytical skills and strategy."

Studin, who was born in Rome to Russian parents en route to Canada, is a veteran of the Toronto soccer system. He played for Armourdale throughout his youth, and as a teen, suited up for North York Hearts and Spartacus. He played for York University for four years, serving as captain for one, and was twice named CIAU all-Canadian.

During one of his college years, he also played for the Toronto Lynx, a semi-pro team, and he twice played for Canada at Maccabi events – in 1997 on the indoor soccer team at the Maccabiah Games in Israel and in 1999 at the Pan Am Maccabi Games in Mexico City.

Studin talked about his season during a recent visit to his family in Toronto. His English soccer experience has been a real eye-opener and he credits the team's coaches for helping improve his game. "I picked up a lot and realized how much I didn't know," he said.

At 25, he's the oldest guy on the team, but some of the stuff he's learned would be old hat to even the youngest of Brits. For instance, in soccer "the captain runs the show. He's god. He makes the decisions, including personnel decisions… In Britain, the captain almost has more power than the coach."

Cambridge, of course, is Oxford's main rival, and emotions before and after matches reach almost "a visceral hatred." Cambridge athletes are called Tabs and a commonly heard slogan at Oxford is "Shoe the Tabs."

Studin said he's had to get used to wearing a suit to games and players can be fined for non-punctuality, with the money going to a team drinking party.

Contrary to stereotypes, only half to 60 percent of the Oxford team members trace their roots to the British elite. The rest are "high achievers" with a few "colonials" like himself thrown in.

Just about everything in England closes at 6 p.m. leaving only a take out meal from a kebab truck or fish and chip wagon available after hours.

As for soccer, many of the games were waterlogged affairs this year, with Britain experiencing one of its wettest fall and winter seasons ever. "You're always playing in the mud, shivering in the rain," Studin said.

His suggestion that soccer be moved to the summer was met with disdain, as if he was balmy, he said. After all, summer is for cricket, he was told.

Studin is enamoured with the British political scene and particularly with the level of discourse.

"It's fascinating, they're masters of the trade," he said. "The British rhetoric is amazing."

Even on the soccer pitch, trash talk reaches impressive levels of elegance and wit, he added.

Next year, Studin will transfer to arch-rival, Cambridge, where he'll enrol in a program that combines philosophy, politics and economics.

When the school year ends this June, he'll move to New York for a stint in investment banking. He'll follow that up in Quebec, where he'll work for Jean Charest.

Injury forces tennis player out

By ILANA BERGER
Ha'aretz Tennis Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Israel's leading male tennis player, Harel Levy, was forced to pull out of the French Open due to a shoulder injury after just one set of his second-round clash against Moroccan Karim Alami.

Levy, ranked 40th in the ATP World Ranking, pulled out of the game after losing the first set to the 109-ranked Alami, and missed out on the chance to play the world's top ranked player – and a close personal friend – Gustavo Kuerten in the third round. Levy lost the first set, 6-4.

Last week's encounter was the first-ever meeting between Levy and Alami, and the pair went to court four knowing that the winner would go on to face Kuerten, who had convincingly beaten Agustin Calleri of Argentina earlier in the day (6-4, 6-4, 6-4).

The first set was a tight affair, which went with service until the ninth game, when the Moroccan broke Levy's serve to take a 5-4 lead.

In the interval between the ninth and 10th games, Levy received treatment on his right shoulder, but after losing the next game and the set, he informed the umpire of his decision to withdraw.

Earlier in the week, Levy made history by becoming the first Israeli to advance to the second round of the Roland Garros tournament since Gilad Bloom did so in 1992. Levy's straight-sets victory over Byron Black of South Africa meant that Israel's highest-ranking male player progressed to the second round of the French Open for the first time in his career.

His forced retirement, therefore, will be even more painful for the 23-year-old Ramat Hasharon resident.

Stories that touch the heart

By

ELI RUBENSTEIN ALEC GELCER

A place in heaven

This story, told by a Holocaust survivor from Poland, concerns a conversation he held with a Polish Catholic priest about the role of the Church during the Holocaust.

The priest told him the following tale:

During the war, a distraught peasant woman came to him for confession. She told him that she had committed a grave sin, and was surely going to suffer in hell for it.

"What was the sin?" he asked.

"I can't say. It's too horrible to mention. But I know I will suffer for it greatly in the afterlife."

The woman was terrified.

"Forgiveness," came the soft reply.

"But I cannot grant you forgiveness until you confess your sin to me," the priest insisted.

For a while, the standoff continued. The woman would not reveal the nature of her sin, and the priest would not grant her penance until she did so.

Finally she yielded.

"I am hiding a Jewish child in my home."

She hesitated, then continued. "My neighbours know about this, and have warned me that I will suffer eternal damnation for this act."

But his repsonse startled her. "What? Is that what you came to tell me? That you have sinned by hiding a poor Jewish child and saving him from certain death? This is no sin. This is a very righteous act. Indeed, after you die, you will go straight to heaven for caring for this innocent child. You have no need of forgiveness from me."

The woman was stunned. She left the presence of the priest slowly, puzzled, shocked and comforted all at the same time.

"What is the nature of your sin?" he asked.

"I have not sinned," came the curt reply.

"Then why are you here?" questioned the priest.

"I have a question to ask you," she replied. "Is it true that if you save a single Jewish child, you are guaranteed a place in heaven?"

The priest, realizing she had heard what he had told the previous woman, answered affirmatively.

But his answer is not the point of the story. The first lesson of this surprising story is this:

Had the Church issued a proclamation during the Holocaust stating that every Christian who saves a Jewish child during the war will gain eternal life, imagine how many Jewish children would have been saved.

But the Church issued no such statement.

Yet this story teaches us more than just a historical fact about the sins of the Catholic Church during the Holocaust, or about the bravery of those individual Christian leaders who took a courageous stand against the Nazis.

Its lesson is much broader, and applies to all religions, faiths and spiritual movements.

The power of religion and religious leaders is immense. Both can be sources of inspiration, and can lead adherents to commit awesome acts of courage, selflessness and kindness.

But when those in places of power within religious structures use their positions for evil, or even for promoting indifference, their capacity for harm is truly terrifying.

Melt margarine in large pot. Add onions, mixing well to coat. Cover and cook over low heat for 15 mins. Add carrots, and stock and bring to boil over med.-high heat. Reduce heat and cover pot. Simmer 20 mins. or until carrots are tender. Remove cover and cool for 5 mins. Place approx. half the soup in blender and blend until puree is formed. Pour puree back into the soup remaining in the pot. Add orange juice, dill weed, cayenne pepper, salt, pepper and yogurt. Mix well and heat additional 5 mins., making certain soup does not boil.

About Life

Dear Ella,

One of my neighbours recently lost her father to cancer. My first instinct was to rearrange my schedule so that I could attend her father's funeral. It would not be easy, as I have two small children who would need to be cared for while I was there.

The more I sat and thought about it, the more I wondered why I was trying to get to this funeral. I remembered that just over a year ago, when this neighbour had her son's bar mitzvah, my husband and I were not invited. I remember being quite hurt and shocked, as the bar mitzvah was not small and I thought we should have been invited.

I felt if I was not good enough to share in her simchahs, then why should I share in her sorrows. I didn't go to the funeral, but I seem to be thinking about my decision a lot. Do you think I was very out of line?

Do Onto Others

Dear Do Onto Others

When someone passes away, you go to their funeral to pay your last respects and to support the family. You made your decision and you can't go back. I am going to assume that you and your neighbour are still on speaking terms or I don't think it would be weighing so heavily on your conscience.

You can't tie in the simchah with the funeral. When people make a simchah, they are always forced to draw the line somewhere, or the affair would get completely out of hand and impossible to afford. Some people cut it off at second cousins, some at co-workers and others at neighbours. You really shouldn't take it personally. Give them the benefit of the doubt.

The most important thing, however, is never to tie that in with the reason for not attending a funeral. You only have one chance to pay your last respects. In your heart if you feel you should go, then go. Don't rationalize or find excuses. Make whatever arrangements you need to and just go. You'll never be sorry you did, only that you didn't.

It's happening in Israel now.

Make friends with Israelis and travelers from all over the world in the cafés of Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, on the beaches of Eilat, at the spas on the Dead Sea.

Be part of the Israel Festival, May 23-July 19, with world-class music, dance, theater, jazz and opera throughout Israel.

Attend Kiri Te Kanawa's Israel concert debut, June 19 in Jerusalem.

Hear Summer Jazz on balmy Jerusalem evenings, June 28-August 30, and at Rehovot's International Jazz Festival, July 3-5.

Cheer the 6,000 athletes from 50 countries (400 are from Canada!) participating in the Olympic-style Maccabiah Games, July 16-26 in Jerusalem and throughout Israel.

Join the Love Parade: Dance, trance, frolic and cavort with 250,000 Israelis and tourists along the Tel Aviv shore in Israel's second annual Love Parade, October 4.

You owe it to yourself to understand what's really happening in Israel today.

Come see today's Israel with your own eyes. Feel the spirit of today's Israel with your own heart.

Give a gift they'll remember

By CAROL WISE
Special to The CJN

The most important decision to make when going to a party is what gift to get for the host, hostess or guest of honour. You may have been fretting about what to wear, how to do your hair or knocking yourself out over fashion details, but you will be remembered mainly for your gift.

How can you give a really fabulous gift that will not only be loved by the recipient, but will make you look like a genius gift-giver? There are two components to keep in mind: generosity and appropriateness.

Be sure when you are buying a gift that it is not only something you like, but something that the person will love. For instance, if the person is fashionable and dresses in an avante-garde style, don't pick an old-style item – they would probably prefer something more high-tech or contemporary. If you're not sure how much to spend, ask someone who has recently made such an event and use that as a starting point.

A Scott Potter bowl.

There are so many wonderful gift ideas this spring; the stores are brimming with delightful goodies to please all budgets and people. I spotted a gorgeous sterling silver set of candlesticks ($195.00) at Henry Birks and Sons, and while I was there, I looked at the Scott Potter one of-a-kind collection. Celebrities such as Oprah Winfrey and Robert DeNiro are avid collectors. The price range is from $65.00 and up, a great gift for the mother of the bride. And for your friends, don't miss the his-and-her palm pilot cases.

At the upscale boutique Hermes (131 Bloor St. W., 416-968-8626), the Victorian Vanity Case is fit for a queen – perfect for the bride who likes to travel. And, for the bride or her bridesmaids, the Hermes red lipstick is perfect for the wedding day and stays on for hours.

Now if you would like to get jewellry for your special honey, a little marvel of a shop named Act II Fine Jewelry (6367 Yonge St., 416-221-5885), carries myriad gift treasures with prices that are consumer friendly.

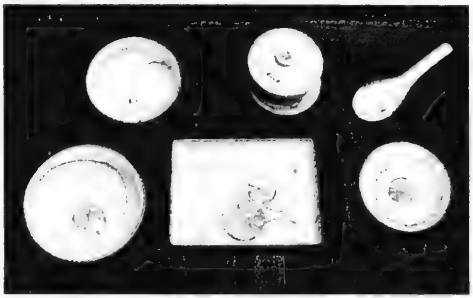
Another great gift shop is PS I Love You (914 Eglinton Ave. W., 416-784-1534). Not only does it hold true to its name, but it's also like one-stop shopping, a real time-saver. Their service is second to none.

Making a gift decision is not easy with so many wonderful items available. Let your imagination play and you might be surprised what you will come up with.

One of the happiest couples I know, my creative friend Tisha and her husband, were recently invited to a wedding and gave the following marriage recipe as their gift:

THE TEN COMMANDMENTS:

Sex: G-String
Sharing: Toothpaste
Spicy: a medley of spices
Humour: a joke book
Romantic: CD and candles
Communication: A book
Truth/Honesty :A sculpture of two people in a loving gaze
Entertainment: Cash
Growing: Seeds
Sweet: Chocolates



A collage of Scott Potter's recent work.

My friends requested that the couple not open the gift until their first fight as they thought it would have a better effect – no doubt!

The great philosopher Kahlil Gibran once said that all that you have will be given someday. So when the season of giving is yours, give a gift.

Fashions by Robin Plus Paradise.

Plus sizes can be fashion forward

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Size should not be an issue when it comes to fashion, says Robin Kauder-Palachi of Robin Plus Paradise (905-886-8776).

"Just because a woman wears a plus size does not mean she shouldn't be fashion-forward," says Kauder-Palachi, who specializes in women's fashions in sizes 14 to 54.

Most malls, she says, have 50 stores, "and one, possibly two, of those stores carry plus sizes. Even then, those stores usually carry matronly or unfashionable clothing. Plus-size women do want to wear sweater sets, capri pants and cargo pants."

Kauder-Palachi buys her stock in the United States, "where I can find manufacturers who are less restrictive, less conservative and who take more chances."

Her store specializes in personal service, she says. "We have large change rooms covered in posters of plus-size women. These are incentive posters. We want them to look at women who look like them, and we want them to love themselves the way they are. A positive outlook is very important."

Becky Scott of Toni Plus (416-633-9331) says that this season, fabrics are body caressing in jersey knits and cotton poplins. "Colours are in summer's brightest shades of pink, turquoise, fucshia, chartreuse, coral, and black and white."

Kauder-Palachi says that for casual parties we're seeing a lot of light fabrics, such as cotton. "Linen wrinkles; it is not a forgiving fabric.

"Women are wearing shimmers – clothing with a slight sparkle. This is what changes daywear to eveningwear. Women can go to work in a skirt and blouse, and then change into a shimmery blouse and jacket for the evening."

She carries multi-purpose clothing. "Once a woman finds something that fits, she wants to be able to wear it again and again. Plus-size women have less choice, so they want to wear what they have. By adding that shimmery touch, it looks like a different outfit, and the woman feels great."

Certain prints and colours are more flattering for plus-size women, she says, "but there is no reason women should not be able to wear what they want; they should wear what everyone else wears."

Scott says that women are going to parties in a floral slip dress which has been updated with an asymmetrical hem, some with ruffles.

"The little black dress with a great neckline is always right for evening partying, and the new stretch fabrics make this sexy classic comfortable to wear.

"For more casual summer partying, capris and ankle pants are good choics. Add a T-shirt or a bright linen shirt, and you have a casual, comfortable feel."

Hairstyle...is part of total look

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A hairstyle is part of a total look, says Mathew Odisha, owner of Mathew's Hair Salon (416-398-5228).

"I always suggest that brides come in with a picture of their dress about three weeks before the wedding. This way we can decide on a hair style that complements the dress," says Odisha, who trained as a hairdresser in Iraq, and has been at his present location for more than one year.

He advises clients to cut their hair at least 10 days before the event, and colour it about one week ahead of time. "Immediately after hair is coloured, the colour is sharp. It needs a week to mellow."

There are no trends in hairstyles, he says. "A style that suits you is the best style."

Pictures, he adds, are not the best way to find a style. "It is difficult to copy from a picture because we are not working with the same hair. I have to look at the hair and see how it reacts to certain styles."

He prefers his clients to change their hairstyles every so often. "I like to update their styles – to move with the times."

If a bride wants an up-do for her wedding, but has never had one before, Odisha says she should come in for a trial. "I do not want her to feel uncomfortable with a style she has never worn. This way, on her wedding day, she will know how the up-do feels."

When a bride comes in for a consultation, he says he likes to see her alone. "I want her opinion. I do not want the opinion of her friend or her sister. I want open communication with the bride. I do not want people to push her.

"I like to do what I think will look best, and I tell her she can always change it. I can usually tell from a woman's face if she likes her hairstyle. She does not have to say a word. A hairstylist learns to be a psychologist."

John Colombo, owner of Hairafter (416-221-6658), also recommends that a bride bring in a picture of her dress when she comes in for a consultation.

"An up-do does not complement a low-cut dress because there will be too much skin exposed. I suggest a trial hairstyle, so there are no surprises the day of the wedding."

Tiger stripes are a new trend in hair colour, says Colombo. "Instead of thin highlights, we do colour in chunks. This really defines the haircut and the style. A colour is chosen to contrast with the natural hair colour. This year the retro look is in. Anything goes – you do your hair as you feel."

He stresses that the bridal party should not forget about the men when they are planning their hairstyles. "Men get dressed up as well. They have to have a style to complement their clothing."

Men are wearing their sideburns longer, he says, because it brings out a face's best features. "Medium to long sideburns complement a longer face."

Men are also starting to put in highlights, says Colombo. "Some are putting in darker lowlights and keeping the rest of their hair grey, so they have a natural look."

PARTY PLANNER

Truffles and tortes sweeten up any occasion

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

Dark chocolate truffles tantalize your tastebuds. Your eyes feast on a sweet table featuring a chocolate swan centrepiece, surrounded by chocolate-dipped apricots and chocolate mint daisies.

If your sweet tooth suddenly needs satisfying, these purely decadent indulgences can be purchased at Chocolate Charm (416-787-4256).

Recipient of the Best Chocolate Shop in North York Award in 2000, Chocolate Charm specializes in the finest hand-made truffles. Using only the highest quality Swiss and Belgian chocolate, it differentiates itself from other chocolatiers.

Chocolate Charm truffle.

"We use top of the line raw materials," says Bob Levine, the store's owner and operator.

"We blend our chocolate with genuine liqueurs, butter and cream, and produce everything in small batches to ensure our creations are always fresh."

Chocolate Charm is called upon to provide displays and desserts for sweet tables as well as gifts for chocolate-lovers.

"Popular now are place tags," says Levine. "We put the names of couples on tags which are attached to a small box of chocolate. This is a trendier way of doing seating arrangements."

Levine says he also does a lot of "sweet boxes," or party favours given to guests at weddings and bar mitzvahs.

"We also do gift baskets and personalized creative gifts, such as the chocolate champagne bottle."

If you're putting in an order that requires printing on a box, like the place tags, you should order about two weeks or a month in advance, Levine says.

All products are kosher, but if you're concerned about nut allergies, Levine says it's best not to eat his chocolates.

"Since we do use nuts in many of our chocolates, all our products may contain traces of nuts."

If you're looking for a caterer to supplement the chocolates made by Chocolate Charm or to provide your party with a dessert menu on its own, here's a sample of what you'll find at Sweet York caterers (416-783-4293): a chocolate brownie, a scoop of mango sorbet with raspberries garnie on a bed of sabra creme and chocolate sauce; orange chocolate mousse torte; strawberry shortcake; frozen lemon torte; Bundt cakes; fruit flans; cookies and fresh fruit.

Opened in 1987 to complement Caterers York, Sweet York fills the demand for high quality pareve desserts.

"We pride ourselves in making Toronto's most delicious 'non-dairy' tortes, flans, pastries and cookies," reads their Web site (www.caterersyork.com), which, by the way, conveniently takes customer orders.

"Though our desserts are kosher," says Sharon Firestone, a company partner, "they don't taste as though they are."

That, she says, is one of the things that makes Sweet York special.

Using creativity and innovation and the finest ingredients, Sweet York can tailor dessert menus (pre-plated and sweet tables) to corporate functions, intimate parties and gala events.

In addition to creating wedding and bar mitzvah cakes, they also have Rosh Hashanah and Passover items.

Specialty cakes should be ordered about two weeks in advance, and prices vary.

Whether you have a sweet tooth or need a sweet table, Chocolate Charm and Sweet York are two delectable choices that are sure to please.

Rules are softening in women's fashions

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Fashion rules have definitely softened, says Ginette Beauchamp, owner of Quasar Mode (416-964-1214), a women's high fashion boutique.

Fashion choice is dependent on lifestyle, body type, and the image a woman wants to portray, she says.

As we emerge from a long winter, colours have become important, she says. "I buy most of my collection from designers working in the south of France. Imagine the inspiration they get from nature.

"Colours such as turquoise, lime green, garnet, sky blue, pale yellow and gold are showing up in all the latest designs. If you want to add some lively pieces to your wardrobe, this is the season."

Women are wearing simple, ankle-length shifts that can be taken from daytime to an evening party, she says.

"A co-ordinating short black jacket trimmed with fuchsia flowers can be worn nicely to the office. After work, take off the jacket, put on some fabulous earrings and a pair of sleek sandals, and you're ready to go to a cocktail party."

We are seeing a lot of synthetic blends this season, she says. "Polyester is absolutely wonderful to wear in 30 degree weather. European designers are using it a lot because it's as rich-looking as silk, holds its colours, and is easily cared for."

Fabrics are fluid. "There is no stiffness in fashion. When you walk, your whole garment moves with you."

Evening pants are being worn, but they are not the focus of high fashion, she says. "If women do wear pants, they are pairing them with brightly coloured halter tops, bolero jackets, or shirts knotted at the waist."

She carries many gowns for brides "who want to look a little different. A sleeveless ivory silk moree gown that skims the body but does not hug it is given an East Indian feel by adding some embroidery around the hem and a square neckline."

Paired with a long jacket trimmed in the same embroidery, and "we have a fabulous look that is proper for a wedding, but not traditional. It would be perfect for an outdoor garden party," she says.

PARTY PLANNER

Make your dreams come true

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Lynn Cohen, consultant and party planner (905-889-1007), has an exacting profession. It's also a highly satisfying one: her work is to make dreams come true. And she has many good suggestions on how to realize your dreams.

A vital part of Cohen's work is to establish that intangible called harmony. The wedding day should be an occasion of mutual rejoicing for the bride, the groom and their families. At the same time, they will all want a say in the shape the festivities will take; and different wishes can be hard to reconcile.

This is one of the main reasons to hire a party planner. She takes a lot of stress off you, especially in dealing with two families at a wedding. As a sympathetic outsider, the planner is a buffer, and builds trust.

Along with empathy and the ability to establish rapport, the planner needs to be well organized. No dream, no matter how sublime, can be realized without careful attention to details. A party planner's organizational talent helps turn the wedding you envision into reality.

Cohen's profession has many other facets. She also helps with budgeting, and choosing the best other party professionals. To choose these people, she must first know your budget limits.

Because your planner advises you on choosing other professionals, engage her services as early as possible: as soon as you have a date in mind, not when it's written in stone. The trend is to book earlier and earlier; Cohen has bookings as far as two years ahead.

In choosing your planner, Cohen advises, listen to word-of-mouth referrals from your friends, and reliable people you know in the party industry. And of course, if you want some of these people working at your celebration, let your consultant know.

To fulfil your dream, a planner needs your input. She needs to know a lot about you, from your tastes in photos and music to how comfortable you are with crowds. So don't hesitate to share with her every aspect of what you want. While you should respect her advice, the final decisions are yours.

Cohen, who has worked for 25 years as a party planner and has many return clients, recommends choosing someone with experience.

Cohen also advises selecting a planner who knows the industry well, has ongoing contact with key people, and keeps abreast of trends and party ideas. To this end, she does bridal shows twice a year.

At the same time, Cohen sympathizes with the idea of giving a newcomer in the field a chance to prove herself. After all, she too was once a beginner.

If you know your planner well, and if she's experienced, you should be able to do most of your work with her on the phone. Otherwise, before you hire her, meet her face to face. In any case, you should be free to call her about anything, no matter how small.

For any wedding, Cohen does have one face-to-face meeting with the bride about six or seven months ahead, sometimes earlier.

Rentals for all your party needs

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

D&D Party Rental (416-665-9570) has been renting out everything from tents and tablecloths to BBQs and bartenders for over 20 years.

"We do weddings, engagement parties, bar mitzvahs, family and corporate parties and even kids parties," says Tony D'Amato, president of D&D Rental, which merged with D'Amato Rental in August 1999.

If you're planning an elegant affair, take D'Amato's word on what party rentals are trendy this season.

"Royal Daulton china is popular. Oversized dinner plates are also trendy and stainless steel cutlery is always in style," he says.

Padded chairs are often used for indoor parties while white bistro chairs, with or without chair covers, are usually used for outdoor parties.

And if your party is outdoors, you needn't fear that it will literally rain on your parade.

"The tents we rent out are waterproof and windproof and provide 100 percent sunblock," says D'Amato.

Heaters and lighting can be provided to ensure your guests are comfortable. And a wooden dance floor can be installed as well.

Per person prices begin at $25, but if you're looking to cut costs, D'Amato has some helpful tips:

"You could do your own decorating, go with white china dishes, folding chairs and regular glasses, as opposed to crystal."

D'Amato believes that great customer service sets his business apart from other rental companies.

"Our approach to customer service is personal. We always have party planners on hand in our showroom to help our clients," he says.

D'Amato accommodates clients with instalment payments, "and we accept all major credit cards," he adds.

So whether you need a SnoKone, popcorn, or candy floss machine or just a few tables and chairs, visit their showroom at 56 Martin Ross Ave. or check out their Web site (www.ddpartyrental.com) for specifics on their prices and policies.

Consultants make party worry-free

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Hiring a party planner is like taking out insurance in that it gives you peace of mind, say consultants Heidi Gruenspan (905-738-5030) and Jolanta Dabrowski (905-415-9341).

Gruenspan, who has been a wedding and party planner for eight years, says her job is to organize the party.

"I offer an initial free consultation in which I recommend a number of tradespeople, such as florists, disc jockeys or decor companies.

"Before I'm hired, I like clients to make sure they are comfortable with me. After all, we will be together for almost a year."

She is there throughout the planning stage "as much or as little as my client wants. I will accompany them to all their appointments, and I can go with them when they look for a dress. Basically, I'm theirs for the whole time."

Dabrowski works with her clients to develop a theme for their party. "I'll ask a bar or bat mitzvah child about their hobbies and we can work from there.

"I'll even help them make their own decorations or centrepieces. One girl wanted a horse theme, so we made centrepieces consisting of a horseshoe attached to a wooden board, with balloons added to it. The girl had a great time doing it herself."

The day of the party is worry-free when a consultant is there, says Gruenspan. "I show up and handle all the mundane details and all the problems."

At one memorable party, she says, there was a bomb threat at the synagogue. "The groom was right in the middle of his speech. The only people who knew about the threat were me and the catering manager. The police came and checked everything out, and nobody knew a thing."

The "everyday problems" include popped buttons, stained dresses and torn pantyhose. "I come with a huge bag filled with such items as a sewing kit, earring backs, insoles and headache pills. If I don't have something needed at one party, I'll certainly have it in my bag for the next party."

Everyone is a guest when a consultant comes to a party, says Dabrowski. "I co-ordinate the disc jockey and the caterer, and make sure all the guests have a seat. Hosts just have to be there and have a good time."

Gruenspan gets a lot of satisfaction from her work. "There is nothing like it when a bride hugs me, or calls me to tell me how wonderful her wedding was."

Today's brides have a lot of choice

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Brides today have a lot of options when choosing a wedding gown says Vivian Prussky, owner of Ritche Couture (416-789-4378) on Avenue Road.

Prussky, who sells bridal and eveningwear by appointment, says she carries over 1,000 different gowns ranging in price from $700 to $4,000, including designer gowns, and gowns from United States, Canada and abroad.

Popular now, she says, are strapless or sleeveless gowns in "varying degrees of formality. The gowns have light lace on top and are completed with a full tulle skirt – big and puffy."

Brides are not afraid of colour anymore, says Prussky. "We carry blue, lavender and peach silk wedding gowns and ivory gowns trimmed in coloured beading. Some brides need some colour in order to add life to their faces, and others want a more contemporary look. These gowns give them the option to do that."

Other gowns are trimmed in silver or platinum lace, she says.

"A lot of brides are opting for a formal look, even though the gown is not traditional. A gown may have a contemporary formal look, with a strapless fitted bodice and a fish-tail train at the back. It is a glamour gown just like we see at the Oscars," says Prussky.

She advises brides to come in at least six to 12 months before the wedding, although they can be accommodated on shorter notice.

"If the bride has no idea what she is looking for, we show her three looks – a full gown, an A-line, or a slim gown. We then talk about what type of wedding she is having, and we look at pictures of various gowns."

A bride's body type is very important when choosing a gown, she says. "We want something that flatters. Our personal consultants can help choose the most flattering gown."

Bridal attendant dresses are more of a party dress, and can be different styles in the same colour, or different colour in the same style, says Prussky.

Many bridesmaids are choosing separate tops and skirts that can take them to the wedding, and then be mixed and matched in order to make up another outfit. It is a practical way to choose a bridesmaid gown."

Popular, she says, is an evening sweater set paired with an irridescent taffeta skirt. "We're seeing a trend towards softer colours, such as rosewater or pineapple. These are soft, but rich-looking colours."

Linens: Choose and handle with care

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Linens have an ancient, well-earned reputation as quality gifts. They're durable and beautiful; they're not fad items. You'll want to choose them with care, and care for them well.

On this subject, Ellis Chitiz of Deblins Linens (416-782-2910, ext. 300) and David Saini of David's Fine Linens (416-590-7311 or 1-877-591-1115) are experts. Here is a little of the information they're ready to share.

Chitiz says a good night's sleep between fine sheets, or drying yourself with a soft bath towel always makes you feel better.

Saini hails fine Irish linen as the perfect gift, be it for bedding or for a formal dinner table. If properly cared for, it lasts for centuries. Other fine linens come from Italy, France and Switzerland.

Saini maintains that natural linen, silk and cotton fibres are still the best. At the same time, he welcomes innovations like the exclusive bleachwood fabrics from Switzerland, used in sheets and towels, and made from wood.

Today, there are more and more quality fabrics, designs and colours on the market. Look at the variety available, Chitiz urges, and give yourself time to choose. And since you can get good quality and a good price, insist on it.

Fieldcrest towels, for example, come in 32 colours; Royal Plush Egyptian-cotton towels come in 24. And Israel now exports fine sateen bedding, which is smooth to the touch, with a pleasant finish.

Saini observes that many fine products still come in white, grey, ivory, beige and earth tones, like taupe and golden brown. At the same time, he likes the Konchini line of European bed linens in bright "fun and funky" primary colours, for kids' rooms and the cottage.

The term "high-tech" usually suggests electronics, but there are just as many innovations in fabrics. Among them is Visa cloth, a 100 percent polyester-treated yarn, which needs no ironing and doesn't stain. Used in tablecloths, it's starting to appear in clothing as well.

Choosing is easier, Chitiz says, if you come prepared. Know your table sizes, the same way you know your bed and clothing sizes. Make sure you get the best by doing a bit more work.

A bit of technical information is useful. Chitiz says woven designs are usually better than prints because they won't fade. And choose cottons with long staple fibres with balling, bumps and impurities combed out in the carding process, before weaving.

Saini mentions density of weave as another quality hallmark. Fine Egyptian cotton will have up to 1,000 threads per square inch.

Buy Egyptian cotton bedding, Chitiz advises: this is the best cotton; used in most of the sheets Israel exports. The more you wash good cotton, the softer it becomes. Another quality cotton is American Supima, also used in rugs.

Look carefully for reputable retailers and suppliers. A retailer who does custom work is best, says Saini. And choose a store with a registry to make sure you get the table linens, bedding and bathware you want, while making purchases easier for your guests.

Most of the items Deblins and David's sell are on their shelves. But because some things, like Deblins' Marproof roll-up table pad, or David's eiderdown duvets, have to be ordered, register and place your orders as soon as you can.

One hallmark of a quality retailer is readiness to offer sound advice on product care. Such a business is built, not on fast turnover of mass products, but on repeat visits from satisfied customers, and those whom they refer.

Cotton, for instance, as Chitiz says, breathes well, but creases easily, so don't leave it bunched up in the dryer. Take it out at once, and fold it or put it on your bed. Saini also holds that care is paramount. David's gives clients brochures on the care of table linens, bed linens and down duvets.

Lots of choice for kosher food

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When you cater a party using King Solomon's Table (416-975-1127) there are no surprises, says owner Joe Elmaleh.

After an initial interview with a member of his catering staff, who can arrange for parties on the premises or at another location, clients come in for a taste test. "We provide them with a selection of three or four pastas to sample, and we prepare chicken for them in a few different ways.

"That way there are no surprises the day of the function. Hosts are often too nervous to really taste the food at the party. By tasting it ahead of time, they really know what their guests are eating."

Hosts can make a party on almost any budget, Elmaleh says. "We can arrange a Chinese buffet dinner for as little as $30 per person, or we can put together a dinner that includes hors d'oeuvres, soup, salad, a main course and dessert.

Light meals are definitely a trend, he says, but kids still love his chicken wings, chicken balls and egg rolls.

"We offer a number of steamed or vegetarian items and tofu dishes, but we also have crispy sesame beef that is deep fried in honey garlic sauce, a chicken picatta in lemon sauce, and chicken venezia, which is deboned, marinated and grilled.

"The beauty of a buffet is that we can cater to all our guests without making special meals."

Rhonda Litwack, owner of Rhonda Litwack Fine Foods (416-787-7337), says she tries to provide her clients with an alternative to traditional kosher food.

"I make things that are a little different. A favourite is my chicken breast stuffed with sun dried tomatoes in an arugula pesto," says Litwack, who has a culinary management degree from George Brown College. She caters throughout the week and offers a take-out menu on Thursdays and Fridays.

When planning a party, she says, she sits down with the clients and looks at the guest list. "What you make for a group of 13 year olds, is not what you would make for a group of 30 year olds.

"For a bar mitzvah party, kids love the smashed potato bar. I offer a number of types of mashed potatoes, and serve them in martini glasses. Kids then add toppings, such as a herb mixture or fried onions."

Kids also love the chocolate fountain, in which they dip marshmallows or candies. "It is like a giant fondue."

She says she does a lot of taste testing and brainstorming to come up with her menu items. "I wanted my mushroom baguette – a pastry filled with wild mushrooms – to be round, so I could slice it and stand it like a tower. It took a while to find the perfect round pan."

She tries not to repeat her dishes "because my clients deserve to be served original items. I do not have a weekly menu. Each menu is prepared one week in advance."

The seasons dictate many of her dishes, she says. "If I see corn in the stores, there is corn on my menu. It is spring now, and there are wonderful cherries, so I will make a wonderful cherry something. I am just starting to think about what to do with them," says Litwack.

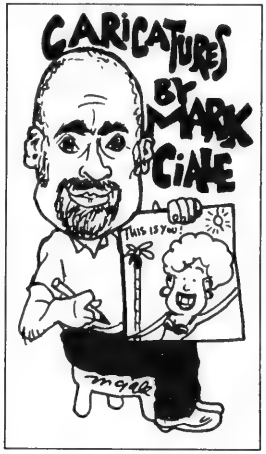
Caricaturists draw praise at parties



By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

If you've been searching for a way to make your special event distinct and memorable, consider drawing upon the talents of a caricaturist.

Mark Ciale (416-203-2514), who began his career as a caricaturist in 1989, says that hiring an artist adds "something unique" to a party.

Brian Montenegro (416-591-7650), a part-time caricaturist since 1988, adds that he can make an event livelier, and also provide guests with a souvenir.

Ciale has noticed an increase in demand for his services over the years, because he believes people are tired of throwing the same old affairs.

Ciale, who does between 125 and 200 events a year, finds that a major part of his business is bar and bat mitzvahs, but he also does corporate parties, house parties, boat cruises and corporate and charity fund-raisers.

"I've also done one to two smaller weddings and they went well."

Montenegro does three or four events a month, including gatherings such as bar or bat mitzvahs, corporate picnics and Chanukah parties.

Although he's never done a wedding, Montenegro says, he thinks it could be fun to have a caricaturist at a wedding reception.

How do you know if one portraitist will be enough to meet the demands of a large party?

To answer this question, Ciale and Montenegro say, you have to consider two main factors: the size of the party and the speed at which the artist can work.

"If there are 150 people, I can do it on my own," Ciale says, "but if there are 200 or 300 people, you'll probably need two to three caricaturists."

As for speed, Ciale says that while most caricaturists can take between five and 10 minutes per portrait, he can do it in half the time while still creating a quality drawing.

"It takes me between three and four minutes to do a caricature," Ciale says.

Montenegro says it usually takes him five minutes or more, "but I put a lot of effort into my drawings, and unlike most caricaturists who only do a profile, I draw full frontal caricatures."

Ciale charges $75 per hour and usually requires that he be hired for a minimum of two to three hours.

There are no hidden fees for things like art supplies, he says, but "if the party is really far from where I live, I might charge for bus or taxi fare."

Ciale recommends booking well in advance of your special affair, especially if you're having a summer event or a Chanukah party.

"Those are especially busy times for me," he says.

Chanukah is a busy season for Montenegro as well, but, he says, "clients usually book me anywhere from a month in advance to a day in advance, and most often I'm available."

Montenegro charges $60 per hour and also requires a minimum of two hours of work.

More to casual Fridays than jeans

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Fashions, it has been said, are as perishable as fresh fruit: what's trendy today is dated next week. While this view is exaggerated, it is often hard to decide what's appropriate to wear.

Yet there are long-term style trends. If you want to be in style and be happy with what you're wearing, these trends are what you have to pay attention to.

One such trend favours dressing up. At the same time, "casual" is being reinterpreted, to mean something like "relaxed, but spiffy."

Tom's Place (416-596-0297), which specializes in ready-to-wear designer suits, with many Italian and Canadian lines, and a good selection of shirts and ties, recently had a very successful sale at the Bloor JCC.

Today, "casual Friday" is still a going concern. For many firms, however, dressing down now means sports jackets, colour co-ordinated wool or cotton slacks and sport shirts or polo knits. Everyday office wear means wool suits, cotton shirts and silk ties.

The move towards extreme casual dress from the '60s to the '80s was a result of many factors. The tendency to relax and literally let one's hair down was partly a result of affluence: people didn't have to dress up in order to get business.

Yet many people were going too far, says Tom: they were interpreting casual to mean sloppy.

Since the '80s, ups and downs in the economy have impelled people to work harder – and to make a better impression by looking better.

Sloppy dress, some studies claim, can lead to a decline in productivity. Accordingly, more companies are enforcing suits in the offfice. Many of those that don't nevertheless insist on suits when their employees see clients or conduct business outside the office.

"Younger people are embracing the suit again," Tom says. They want to get that prestige job or client – and look good while they're at it, he says.

Tom advises purchasing a suit in a colour and style that will suit you for many years and be appropriate for many occasions. Don't be too trendy: think long-term.

This advice, he adds, applies as much if you're buying a suit for a gift as if you're going to wear it yourself.

Travel Tips to get you on your way

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

Imagine lying on a beach with a piña colada in your hand, the sand between your toes, the sun warming your skin. You're having the time of your life. All of a sudden, the thought hits you: "Did I pay more than I had to for this piece of paradise?" or "Was it really such a good idea to bring my family into the turmoil here?"

The CJN spoke to two travel agents to help answer the questions you'll need to get you off the ground and home safe and sound.

Ehud Telem, president and owner of Peerless Travel (905-886-5610), assures his clients that despite a tremendous decline in travel to Israel, the destination is still safe.

"I'm still booking group trips to Israel and everyone has come back safely. They all tell me that they had an enjoyable, relaxing vacation, without even one dangerous incident," Telem says.

Brian Feldbloom of Flight Travel (416-481-0422), which specializes in providing clients with lowest airfare and vacation rates, says Greek cruises are particularly popular for summer honeymooners.

Both agents agree that taking a cruise is an experience in itself and makes for a perfect vacation or honeymoon.

"The cruise is one of the best vacations you can have," says Telem. "The food is better, the entertainment is better and the activities are better than you would get at an all-inclusive."

And unlike an all-inclusive, cruise passengers can visit three or four countries on a single trip, depending on the package.

If you have special dietary needs, such as a preference for kosher meals, Telem and Feldbloom say that most ocean liners will be more than willing to accommodate their guests. Just remember to alert them in advance.

Prices for a cruise can fluctuate dramatically depending on your sleeping accommodations and the week you intend to depart.

"Vacations are least expensive in October and November because it's hurricane season in many places," Feldbloom says.

"Trips are also cheapest about a week before school breaks. I think of it as the quiet before the storm."

Telem explains that you can further reduce the cost by opting for an inside cabin rather than a more expensive suite at the top of the boat.

And for those reluctant to jump aboard a ship for fear of succumbing to seasickness, Telem says that these days, seasickness should not be a major concern.

"You don't get nauseous on modern ships because they move so slowly and are so huge and stable."

Feldbloom recommends booking far in advance so as to take advantage of early booking bonuses.

Despite the advantages of a cruise, an all-inclusive has its advantages as well. For instance, alcoholic beverages and tipping are already included in the vacation price.

An all-inclusive may be the best option for people who have a flexible schedule.

"You can get the best deal if you wait for a sell-off and book your trip a week or two in advance," Feldbloom says.

But he cautions last minute bookers to remember that they run the risk of limited selection, and the trip they were looking forward to taking may even be sold out.

"You don't want to be disappointed," Feldbloom says.

Choosing a venue can be a complex decison

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

When it comes to choosing a hall or caterer for your event, the options are many. Advising you how to choose, both Cary Silber of La Pineta (905-851-7371 or 416-661-4460), and Elizabeth Yeung of the Liberty Group (416-504-9435), speak with the voices of experience.

Most banquet halls, Silber says, only do one sort of style; so choose a hall whose staff combine versatility and experience. La Pineta has been operating for 20 years, in its own restaurant and banquet facilities, and elsewhere in venues from bars to convention centres; it knows how to accommodate all tastes.

Pick a caterer who listens to you, urges Silber. Respect his professional advice, but make sure you're in control. If there's too much resistance to your ideas at the start, you know it will get worse.

Rapport is a major factor. Within the first few minutes of your first meeting, you usually know if you and the caterer are on the same wavelength. Once you're certain you're going to work with him, inform him of every detail, no matter how small.

Silber advises booking your hall at least one and a half to two years ahead — for a specific date, the earlier, the better. After that, you'll need one to three more meetings.

The final face-to-face consultation, a few weeks before the function, can be as crucial as the first. This is the time for finishing touches like minor menu changes, small in themselves, which add up to make an event special. Your co-ordinator should be there, consulting with the caterer on every detail.

Silber points out three advantages of choosing a hall over a hotel. It's better for your budget: the hotel, with its higher overhead, will cost more. A hotel, hosting many functions at once, will give you less personal attention. And if the hotel is in a densely built-up area, you often pay for parking.

Yeung of the Liberty Group also puts a high value on reputation. Its venues (the Rosewater Supper Club, the Market Circle Courthouse and Chamber Lounge, and the Left Bank) are so sought after, they've had to turn clients away. Hence, their new Liberty Grand Entertainment Complex.

The Liberty Group has signed a 20-year lease of a historic building on the Exhibition grounds, built in 1926, to house the complex. Liberty Group can renovate, but not change the facade, the floor-to-ceiling windows overlooking the lake, or old-fashioned fittings like crystal chandeliers and wall sconces.

The total area, 100,000 square feet, includes three ballrooms. The Governor's Room will hold 800 guests sitting or up to 1,200 standing; the Renaissance and Centennial rooms will hold 400 sitting or 700 standing.

The Renaissance and Centennial will be ready in June; the Governor's Room, in September, for the Toronto Film Festival opening gala. And in late September or mid-October, Liberty Grand will host the World Leaders' Group, a symposium for people in all areas of endeavour from literature to industry.

Versatility is also a key to the Liberty Group's success. The Liberty Grand will host every kind of private and corporate event, from a minimum of 150 guests to 3,000. They have three fully equipped kitchens, and will meet all dietary requirements. Special needs such as wheelchair access are being provided for.

Book really early, though. Already, some dates are reserved for 2003. Elizabeth Yeung is Marketing Director for Liberty Grand; Michael Lende (416-564-4033), founder of the Capitol Theatre, is Sales Co-Ordinator. You can also visit the Web sites at www.libertygroup.com or www.libertygrand.com.

When it comes time to prepare for that special occasion you should not be spending your time on the wording of the invitations and addressing envelopes.

Barbara Mortfield of Barbara Mortfield Invitations (905-738-1232) and Cynthia Sager of Please Reply (905-508-9669) can help.

Clients expect reliability and good advice on everything from wording to designs appropriate for the occasion. Being artistic, empathetic and politically correct are musts when dealing with invitation professionals.

Mortfield and Sager both have wide varieties of invitations, ranging from ones appropriate for formal occasions to cards for children's birthday parties, and both are able to suit anybody's tastes.

Mortfield says she can narrow down even the pickiest customers' tastes within two minutes of showing the client samples by seeing which ones are discarded and which are set aside for consideration.

No matter who the customer is, selecting the perfect card is done by process of elimination, although sometimes it means looking through every sample book available.

Custom cards can be created as well by mixing and matching aspects of other cards or by changing minuscule aspects of existing cards. The custom cards require very little extra time to make, so even if a client orders the card a little late, custom options are still possible.

Since much of the invitation industry is based on word of mouth, a good reputation is of the utmost importance.

After being in the invitation field for 32 years, Mortfield has earned a good reputation. People have been so pleased with her invitations that she has been asked to provide invitations for her customers' wedding after providing invitations for their bar/bat mitzvah only a decade earlier. She has even seen the grandchildren of people for whom she provided bar mitzvah invitations!

"An invitation doesn't have to be expensive, it just has to look expensive," is her motto, she says. In order to give the best prices to her customers, she can use ordinary paper instead of special, more expensive paper, and still create a quality card.

Party planning now available online

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Weddings and bar mitzvahs have come online with companies such as Up & Coming (905-886-8148) and Onlysimchas.com.

Karen Garscadden, a special events planner who owns Up & Coming with Karen Jacobs, operates two Web sites – one for pictures and general information, and another to purchase party goods.

The general Web site, she says, is intended for people to say "'Wow! Can [that company] really do that?'

"It's not so much for information as it is a tool to show people what party planners do."

Up and Coming's second site (www.upandcomingevents makesparties.com) is more hands-on, she says. "It's a huge catalogue of party favours and give-aways. Hosts can go through the brochure and order everything online. The goods can be delivered to our office, and we will bring them to the party."

The benefit of a Web site is that people do not have to come to the showroom. It saves a lot of time, she says.

"We recommend that people choose a large number of favours, but with less variety. That way all the guests get involved. If everyone on the dance floor is wearing oversized glasses it makes a big impact. Party favours complete the mood of the party."

Onlysimchas.com, has been online for about one year, says co-founder and president Doron Katz, 26.

"The company began after my brother-in-law, Dov Katz, took pictures at a wedding, developed a Web site, and put the pictures online. The response was so tremendous that we decided to start a business."

The Web site allows anyone to post pictures of their simchah online, he says. "They can either use a digital camera or scan in the pictures. For a charge, they can send us the pictures and we will enter them online. Otherwise, the site is free."

The site has pictures posted from Canada, Israel, England and Australia, says Katz. "In March alone, 1.4 million pages of pictures were looked at. The site has grown unbelievably.

"It is simple to use the search engine to find the over 700 galleries of pictures. While at the gallery, viewers can sign a guest book and leave a message for the couple."

An advantage of the site, he says, is that people who could not attend the wedding can look at pictures a few hours after the event. "They almost feel like they were there."

In the works, he says, is a deal that will allow people to buy wedding and engagement gifts over the Internet. "People can look at engagement pictures of the couple and then click on a registry list. They can buy the couple's gift then and there."

Also at the site is a directory of such services as videographers, bands, decor companies and party consultants.

Katz says they are speaking to photographers about having professional pictures put online. "We did a survey, and 92 percent of respondents said they liked the idea of viewing professional photographs.

"Overall, it is a site that makes people happy. People can turn to it every day and see uplifting pictures," he says.

Dressing up the kids

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

When choosing a tailor or dressmaker to dress a son or daughter for a formal affair, be it a wedding or bar /bat mitzvah, you can rely on many of the guidelines you follow for yourself. Choose professionals, with the right blend of quality stock, expertise, creativity, reliability and rapport.

Goldie Hauer and Penina Feintuch of "Belle of the Ball" Gown Rentals (416-778-6153), and David Hadden of Beatties (416-481-4459), have established solid reputations built on these qualities. They also have insights into considerations which apply more to children than adults.

Especially with a young girl, renting a gown may make more sense than buying – which is why Feintuch and Hauer founded "Belle of the Ball".

They design and create original formal gowns for rental, for ages one to 12 or 13; they also carry accessories such as bows and bands.

Feintuch and Hauer have endured the tribulations of outfitting daughters. Often, for a special affair, they purchased a lovely dress which was worn once, then hung in the closet, never to be worn again.

Rental makes more sense. You see a dress you like, show your daughter, have her try it on, and rent it for one affair only. And if a gown especially takes your fancy, you can buy it. Considering the hi-jinks even the most decorous girl can get into, durability is a major factor. Make sure the gown can stand the odd bit of horseplay. Many types of silk, velvet, satin, organza, peau de soie and lace are practical as well as beautiful.

"Belle of the Ball" rentals range from $100 to $140, depending on size, fabric quality and detail; this includes the cost of dry cleaning. You pick up your dress the day before the event, and return it one to two days after.

Minor damage, e.g. to hems and bows, is repaired free. For major damage, the customer is charged.

"So far," says Hauer, "we have not had any problems with major damage!"

Beatties is quite a different business, based on fine boys' clothing, both ready to wear and made to measure.

David Hadden's emphasis on quality is equal to that of Hauer and Feintuch.

Look for range and variety, advises Hadden, who carries 1,500 suits and 500 shirts in stock. At the same time, insist on products and service which are above the norm.

For bar mitzvah suits, fine, light, comfortable wools are in, with three-button plain fronts. So are knit polos or mock sweaters; Perry Ellis offers a fine line of polos, made with light, comfortable Italian fabrics. Among the quality sportswear lines are Tommy Hilfiger and More & More.

To make buying boys' clothes even more challenging, there's adolescent growth. While Beatties specializes in fitting out husky boys, Hadden has seen lots of husky kids shoot up tall and gangly within a year.

And as you'd expect, boys themselves are more interested in casual wear. These days, it's the skateboarder look with open bottoms, like the Quiksilver snowboarder/skateboarder line. For this summer, Hadden also predicts a lighter, looser, brighter look, with vivid colours such as orange.

Whatever is on the shelves and hangers, service should includes ordering for you -- and doing alterations. Hadden, who sees customers bring in first, second and third sons, ascribes much of his reputation to his tailor, who has been with Beatties for 20 years. (For made-to-measure, he says, order three weeks ahead.)

Flowers add ambiance, elegance to any event

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

Flowers are an elegant way to add atmosphere to your special event, but if you don't choose the right florist or the right flowers, you could break your piggy bank, and your hopes of hosting that perfect party could quickly wilt.

Karen Baker has been working in the industry for about 20 years, and her business, Designs by Karen Baker (905-886-8100), specializes in total event planning.

"I take care of everything from floral arrangements and chair covers to linens and lighting," says Baker, who focuses on weddings, bar mitzvahs, and corporate-themed and non-themed parties.

Gordon Dick of Van Bassen Flowers (416-222-6751) specializes in fresh flowers, centrepieces and table arrangements. He says that not only do flowers lighten and brighten up a room, but "they add that finishing touch to a special event."

To maximize your investment, Dick and Baker agree that you should opt for blooms that are in season, because out-of-season flowers are more expensive.

"At this time of year," says Dick, "dahlias and snapdragons are in season, as are gerberas."

Baker adds roses, peonies, lilacs and orchids to that list.

She says that if you're on a tight budget, roses are the way to go.

"The nicest and cheapest roses come from Ecuador because the exchange rate is good and roses can be produced there all year round. Roses are practical, and they always look elegant," she says.

So how much should you spend on flowers? Baker says the price for floral arrangements for a wedding depends on what the bride and groom want. The average cost of weddings she does is about $5,000.

"This price includes the flowers, room decor, bridal bouquet, chupah, and the set-up and take-down fee," Baker says.

Dick's centrepieces cost $35 and up, and he says there's no delivery charge on small orders that don't require his staff to decorate.

To ensure the florist you've hired is able to handle the job, Baker recommends asking around to see what kind of reputation your florist has earned.

"You should also ask to see a sample of their work to get an idea of the type of events they've done and how successfully they've done them."

Your florist should not only be capable of making your event beautiful, he or she should also be creative and capable of listening to the clients' ideas. This ensures that the final product is everything the clients intended it to be.

That is why Dick does a select number of large parties a year. "I like to have the time to concentrate on each event," he says.

Baker does more than 250 parties a year and agrees that it's very important for florists to listen to their clients.

"We sit down with our clients to get a sense of what they want, and then our creative staff try to plan something that is artistic and different from the average event in order to make it unique and special," says Baker.

Since summer is an especially busy time for weddings, Dick advises booking a florist a few months before the party.

Baker says some of her clients have reserved with her three years in advance, "but some clients book me a month in advance – it just depends on the person's style."

Dressing up with Korry

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

To all appearances, dressing up isn't just in again: it's a longterm trend. But casual dress is still in, too. And it's harder to decide when to wear what.

There have always been degrees of formality, on the occasions which require a suit or a tux. Likewise with casualwear: you wouldn't wear the same clothes to a company picnic and your kid's baseball playoffs.

Today, though, there are more nuances of style; and choosing can be confusing. To unravel the confusion, you need three sources of input: your workplace dress code; advice from a fine clothier; and your personal knowledge of what suits you.

Saul Korman of Korry's Clothiers to Gentlemen (416-463-1115) is an expert on how to look your best, and feel good about it. His expertise harks back to before 1955, when he and his father opened Korry's.

H's always maintained high standards in materials, craft work and style; and he promotes them in every venue from classrooms to radio spots.

Korman understands the philosophy behind dressing up. Your appearance projects your self-image. If you look confident and capable, not only do others see you as such: you enhance your positive feelings about yourself. And feedback from this enhances your positive projection to others.

Korman is a dedicated member of the Back to Business/Dress Up Thursdays Committee. This non-profit coalition of mens' clothiers was founded to solve the dilemmas many companies face, in response to the confusions and

Jewish wedding memorabilia is subject of exhibit

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Putting together the exhibit on Jewish weddings at Beth Tzedec's Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum was truly a labour of love for museum curator Dorion Liebgott, whose preparations included taking home a 1934 ivory satin silk wedding gown to carefully press it and hand-stitch a loose panel.

I Betroth Thee Unto Me Forever: The Jewish Wedding kicked off April 22 with a festive opening reception, complete with klezmer music and a sweet table. It runs until October.

Repeat visitors to the museum may recognize some of the antique ketubot on display, which were the impetus for the theme. "We have this wonderful collection of ketubot," Liebgott said in a recent interview at the museum, pointing out a document from Tehran, circa 1908. She recalls thinking to herself, "We really should do something [with them]."

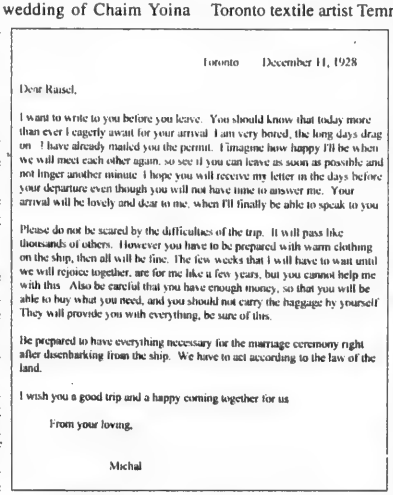
More recent memorabilia is accompanied in many cases by stories, often with a strong Jewish component. One account tells of the December 1946 wedding of Chaim Yoina Kleinman and Mania Kresziwer. The couple met in Bergen-Belsen when it was a displaced persons' camp following the war. For the wedding, Kresziwer wore the wedding dress that the Bergen-Belsen brides shared.

Other wartime weddings included in the exhibit are that of Canadian Bert Danson and his British wife, Theodora (Dot); another that took place in Shanghai; and that of Janis and David Springer, whose ketubah bears the Israel Defence Force insignia.

Also featured in the exhibit is the heavily beaded dress that local filmmaker Karen Shopsowitz wore at her wedding. It is one of the few items that her grandmother, Jenny, brought when she immigrated from Kielc, Poland.



Toronto December 11, 1928

Dear Raisel,

I want to write to you before you leave. You should know that today more than ever I eagerly await for your arrival. I am very bored, the long days drag on. I have already mailed you the permit. I imagine how happy I'll be when we will meet each other again, so see if you can leave as soon as possible and not linger another minute. I hope you will receive my letter in the days before your departure even though you will not have time to answer me. Your arrival will be lovely and dear to me, when I'll finally be able to speak to you

Please do not be scared by the difficulties of the trip. It will pass like thousands of others. However you have to be prepared with warm clothing on the ship, then all will be fine. The few weeks that I will have to wait until we will rejoice together, are for me like a few years, but you cannot help me with this. Also be careful that you have enough money, so that you will be able to buy what you need, and you should not carry the baggage by yourself. They will provide you with everything, be sure of this.

Be prepared to have everything necessary for the marriage ceremony right after disembarking from the ship. We have to act according to the law of the land.

From your loving,

Michal

The oldest dress, a traditional Moroccan (Berberisca) garment accompanied by an ornately jewelled headpiece, is at least 140 years old.

Beside it is the wedding invitation of Lizzie and Morris Smith, who married on Jan. 5, 1890. Although the locale is not specified, Liebgott assumes it was Goel Tzedec, because, according to the invitation – which was purchased by the donor – the ceremony was "at the Synagogue, Cor. University and Elm Streets."

"I'm waiting for someone to say, 'This is my family,'" said Liebgott.

Unusual modern items include a kittel by Toronto textile artist Temma Gentles, and the 1994 chupah of Jonathan Wyman and Meredith Halpern, comprised of 36 squares of cross-stitched, painted or needlepointed fabric joined quilt-style. It was designed and executed by family and friends.

The exhibit also has a historical and religious context, and a number of multi-generational displays – among them photos and memorabilia from the families of the late Pearl Freedhoff, Toronto's first professional bridal consultant, and the Hyman family of Hyman's Book Store, once a fixture on Spadina Ave.

Museum hours are Monday, Wednesday and Thursday, 11-1 and 2-5. Also Sundays 11-2 (except for July, August and public or Jewish holidays).

How to pick your photographer

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

"If anything about a party is eternal," says Alex Himell of Platinum Studios (905-709-7754), "it's the photos."

Arnold Machtinger, of Photos by Arnold (905-881-6372), agrees, though he'd also grant this status to the video.

Platinum Studios photograph.

What makes a photographer special, in Machtinger's view, is a blend of skill and sensitivity. "If all you want is a photo," he says, "get a friend to take it for you." He sees himself in the customer service business.

Himell lists three qualifications for a photographer. Most important is rapport. You must be on the same wavelength in order to be confident he will do his job well and ensure he asks sensible questions and makes suggestions, but never dictates what you should do. His artistry is the second qualification and experience is the third.

Machtinger would never choose a photographer without seeing his work and meeting him. There's no point talking to the head of the company and liking his work, only to find out on the big day that he's sent someone else to your function.

Get the head of the company, Himell says, or his most trusted assistant.

And choose someone who works well with the other professionals at your event – especially the consultant, who should also be there in the flesh.

A good photographer is never the centre of attention, and unobtrusively fades into the background at need. Technological advances have made this easier, eliminating such intrusions as flashbulbs and tangled cords on the floor.

At the same time, Himell thinks it's a good idea for a photographer to develop some rapport with the guests. He's photographing not just an event, but people, and friendly subjects make for better shots.

Himell also places a high value on improvising, triumphing over unexpected hitches, like rain on an outdoor event or a power failure. He goes so far as to say that with a real professional, you wouldn't even notice a power outage.

Book your photographer as soon as you know your date, Himell urges. For weddings or other events in the warmer months, which are his busiest times, six months ahead is the minimum, but a year is better.

And while a flexible date is an advantage, it's not possible with something like a bar or bat mitzvah. For such events, always book a year ahead.

See your prospective photographer and his work, Machtinger urges, even before you finalize your photo budget, but remember, good work merits spending a bit more. While he won't discuss budget on the phone, he considers himself in the medium to high price range.

Machtinger, with a background in both computers and photography, can "bring it all together" technologically. He recommends choosing a photographer who knows the technology, which is a constantly changing field in its own right.

But, he emphasizes, a good professional isn't interested in technology for its own sake. What ultimately counts is the pictures he takes and the quality of his service.

Himell agrees. Important as technical competence is, it's less your concern than the photographer's. He should discuss your clothing styles, hobbies and other factors that affect the kind of photos you like – not the technology, except where it has a direct bearing on your wishes.

Know what you want, Himell advises, but be flexible. Try not to make a final decision until you see the proofs, as you may see something unexpected that you like.

Interactive Entertainers

THE DISCO KNIGHTS (FREEDOM OF SOUND) 905-760-0040

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Entertainment companies help make a party happen, agree several party professionals.

David Hart, co-owner of Hart Entertainment with his brother Phil (416-762-2200), carry a wide range of interactive games that keep guests busy for hours, he says.

Games such as the "brand new" survivor obstacle, sumo wrestlers, racing simulators or a golf course complete with score cards, keep the kids busy while the adults are eating, he says. "Kids finish eating quickly and need something to do before the music starts up again. There are also kids who need a break from dancing. These games are perfect for them."

He stresses, however, that the games are not just for kids. "Adults have a ball with them."

The company also offers a wide range of performers, such as henna artists, walk-about musicians, and props for themes, such as beach party, night in Las Vegas or the '50s. "We just moved to a larger showroom, and by appointment, people can come in and view our entire line."

Tal Maissner, general manager of Freedom of Sound (905-760-0040), says the latest rage at parties is "performance art. Using smoke, we can have the bar or bat mitzvah child enter the party out of thin air. It makes a magnificent entrance."

Another trend, he says, is having an interactive disc jockey along with a themed band. "A band that plays disco or '60s music, for example, can alternate back and forth with the DJ. It can be done seamlessly."

Performers, such as fire jugglers, have become popular, says Maissner, "because people love live entertainment. They like to be wowed."

Jared Florence from Entertainment Xtreme (416-488-8411), says that new this year is the party patrol. "We've created teams of MCs and dancers who go out to parties and perform specific routines, such as Blame it on the Boogy.

"It makes it a lot more professional because the performers in the team work out and practise together, and when they perform, it looks like a team effort."

"Kids know a lot of the dances, but they always like to see something new and fresh. Watching the dancers do routines in a co-ordinated fashion is like watching a show. The dancers come in full costume, which adds colour and visual energy to the show."

Levine, who has been in the party business for 25 years, says he offers rental items, such as casino machines, and famous look-alikes – entertainers who perform like Tina Turner, Elvis Presley or the Beatles. Things like this give people the party of their life."

Todd Silverman, manager of Starr Productions (905-707-8211), says the latest party trend is the dance cube. "We bring out cubes that are lit from the inside, and kids can get on top of them and dance. It makes them feel like performers. The kids love it."

The bar or bat mitzvah child, or even the entire family, can come out to Starr's facilities for a few dance lessons before the party, says Silverman. "They learn all the latest steps, and they're really ready to party."

E.J. Kravetz says Events Toronto (416-698-5084), can increase the "wow" factor at any bar or bat mitzvah. "Through innovative routines, group dances, contests and games, we inspire everyone to join in – adults and kids."

New this year, he says, are Events Toronto "camp counsellors. We don't want to give too much away, but we can tell you that if you have a large crowd and want them to be entertained throughout dinner without hindering your guests' schmoozing time, give us a call and we'll fill you in," says Kravetz.

PARTY PLANNER

Kids love the great giveaways

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

On a recent Saturday night in May children and adults boogied at Lauren Wyman's bat mitzvah party.

The DJ and dancers led partygoers of all ages in slow dancing, fast dancing and horahs and line dancing, and there were plenty of give-aways to add to the frivolity.

Children and adults donned glow or neon necklaces, wigs, boas and sunglasses as they danced up a storm to the likes of Aqua, Madonna and the Village People. And the give-aways helped many non-dancing guests get into the party spirit.

Give-aways enhance bar and bat mitzvah parties, says Steve Dennis, owner of Dominion Smallwares (416-665-9526), a novelty and stationery supply company specializing in party supplies and bar/bat mitzvah give-aways.

"The purpose of the give-aways is to get the people on the dance floor, to get them interactive," Dennis says.

Dominion Smallwares, located at 356 Supertest Rd., offers an assortment of give-aways which include hats, sunglasses, wigs and other dress-up items; glow necklaces; battery-operated, light-up head bobbers and rings; and an assortment of inflatable novelties.

Also available are LED (light emitting diode) items. They are illuminated by a bright light that uses less energy than conventional batteries, says Dennis. "We're always looking for new light novelties."

His foray into bar/bat mitzvah party give-aways began with supplying street vendors with glow necklaces and battery operated novelties, he says, explaining that the glow necklaces were popular items at rock shows and street festivals.

"Out of this we started to get connected to DJs and party planners. They asked, 'Can you get this?' 'Can you get that?' and I'd say, 'Sure no problem.'

"A lot of the DJs know to go to Dominion Smallwares ... I have a program for DJs who do their own reselling."

His warehouse is also open to the public, and his give-away packages are tailored to each individual party and budget, he says. "I'm generally lower priced and I have a great selection. One of our best features is that we advise people on what items they should have. Nachama, my assistant is the expert."

He recommends that people book appointments to plan their party needs.

The glow necklaces, created from a chemical light source, have been popular bar/bat mitzvah novelties for about the last 10 years and are the single most expensive give-away item, Dennis says.

The chemical light is caused by a chemical reaction between two different chemicals in the tubes, he notes.

"When you bend the tubes, there's a mix of the two substances and the chemical reaction causes these things to glow for six to eight hours."

The chemical light was discovered by the military which was developing a non-battery light source, and eventually the technology was adapted for the glow necklaces, he adds.

"But the chemical reaction doesn't work below freezing. The necklaces can be thrown into the freezer and you can get more use out of them."

For bar/bat mitzvah give-aways you can also head over to Tyme to Party, (905-737-2789), a 6,000-square-foot party-supply department store located at 10303 Yonge St., across the road from the new Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto campus in Richmond Hill.

Originally established in Waterloo, Tyme to Party was relocated to Richmond Hill three years ago.

Loot bags and kosher candies

"We specialize in loot bags and bar and bat mitzvah give-aways," says Norene Norris, who runs the business with her husband, Harvey.

"People can make their own bags or we can do it for them. We customize loot bags to every budget."

She adds that Tyme to Party carries a wide selection of items geared to gender and age group.

For example, she says teenagers like glow sticks, and a ball that flashes light when it bounces is also very popular with this age group.

For loot bags, Norris recommends putting in a big ticket item like a game or toy, and then adding some smaller items. "We do not put junk in our loot bags."

Boys enjoy games, such as Space Wars, as well as model airplanes and puzzle balls, Norris adds.

Incorporating candy and sweets into a loot bag is very much an individual choice, she says. "We have kosher candy that can be added. The bags are all customized. It depends on what people want."

Tyme to Party offers a full array of bar and bat mitzvah give-aways, she says. "We're very big on bar and bat novelties, such as flashing bellybutton lights, lights for the ears, flashing tie pins and earrings, flashing necklaces and neon necklaces."

Along with expert advice and friendly, highly personalized service, Norris says the prices at Tyme to Party are very reasonable. "I try to give people having a bar or bat mitzvah party a good price. I know how expensive it is. I've been through it."

With dress-up items being popular give-aways, there's is plenty to choose from, she adds. "We have 2,500 square feet for costumes."

Tyme to Party carries a large assortment of balloons and invitations, as well as a large selection of Judaica-themed items for bar/bat mitzvahs and holiday celebrations, Norris says. "We're [one of] the only [party] stores in Richmond Hill offering Judaica items."

Lots of fun with animals and Barbie

BY BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Lynn Kaplan has been an animal lover as long as she can remember.

Kaplan is the owner of Whimz (416-656-7894), a company that does parties, programs, classes and camps featuring an array of live animals from reptiles and amphibians to small mammals and bugs.

"I was the one who drove my mother crazy bringing animals home as a child. I went to the pet stores. My mother finally posted my picture in all the pet stores with a note saying, 'This kid is not allowed to bring home any more animals.'

"She said, 'When you grow up and have a home of your own, you can have as many animals as you want.' I took that one step further and turned it into a business."

She and her 10-year-old daughter Dalia care for some 50 animals who reside in the basement of their home. Their menagerie includes chinchillas, hedgehogs, gerbils, hamsters, all kinds of lizards, toads, turtles, snakes, rats and exotic pets such as their Australian sugar glider, a marsupial in the kangaroo family.

Rebecca Hussman, Caitlin Kroll and the rabbit.

"[In size], the sugar glider is somewhere between a monkey and a squirrel. The children can pet him inside a pouch."

They get to hold the animals, she says, noting that snakes are easier to hold than rabbits. They can even pet the scorpion, while Kaplan holds its stinger, but some of the animals such as hedgehogs are for viewing only.

Kaplan, a visual artist by training, started the party business six years ago. "I was a stay-at-home mother and I wanted to do something."

She does birthday parties at people's homes or at the Zodiac Family Centre and she runs camps and after-school programs from her home and at some of the Jewish day schools. She organizes special themed programs for Jewish organizations and schools, often at holiday time.

"We do Jewish themes for the religious schools and Jewish pre-schools. At Tub' Shvat we were huge. We were all over the place. Every year we do lots of family Chanukah parties."

For birthday parties, she and her assistants, many of whom have been involved in her camps and school programs, go all over the city. "We bring a variety of animals — from five to eight."

She says the preferred age group is four to 12. But she does a lot of parties for three-year-olds as well.

And Kaplan says she still can't resist shopping in the the pet stores. "Now it's my daughter telling me, 'Don't get it mummy. We don't need any more.'"

For a different kind of birthday party, parents may want to consider Barbie's Dress-up Tea Party (416-221-5881), the ultimate dressup party for girls with ball gowns and sparkly make-up galore for children and adults in every size or shape

Owner Lisa Ragow, who grew up with loads of Barbie dolls, opened the party-dressup business after moving to Toronto from the United States, where she had run an interior design business with her mother.

Ragow started the dress-up business out of a 1000-square-foot condo and then moved to a home with a Barbie House addition near Sheppard Avenue and the 401.

The children can choose from more than 500 dresses, and there are hundreds more in the basement.

PARTY PLANNER

Now you see it... now you don't

By MICHAEL SPIAR
Special to The CJN

Every kid loves magic, but performing the trick is even better.

Ari Charlstein, 13, will astound and amaze at your party, performing "close-up magic," ranging from sleight of hand to card tricks. Usually performing within 10 feet of his audience, Ari has an arsenal of 35 tricks and adds to it constantly, making even small tricks look big.

"There's one trick where the audience picks a card, and then I can make it appear anywhere in the room, like in my wallet or in a corner on the ceiling," he says.

Ari is able to please a mixed crowd. Though his show is not age specific, it does require that the audience recognize cards – so little children might not understand it.

"It won't work well with little kids because they don't really know what's going on – they can't follow a card," he says.

"At shul there was a magician once, and I really liked it… then on the bus one time, I passed by a magic store and just went in," he says.

Living in Israel, he had only three tricks, but when he moved to Canada three years ago, he expanded his repertoire. Today he is a skilled magician, performing with seasoned showmanship.

In addition to his cards, Ari also has some tricks where he uses props, such as crystal tubes, and the quintessential handkerchiefs tied together. One crowd favourite is a trick where he takes an ordinary coin, making it appear anywhere within a deck of cards.

You can book Ari by calling 416-484-0144.

Ketubah

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

Ketubah Ketubah, a company specializing in hand-made ketubot, has successfully married art and technology.

The company, which represents 40 artists, offers a selection of 200 ketubah designs which can all be purchased on the World Wide Web, says company owner and founder Michael Shapiro. "I wanted to open up a Jewish art business, and this is what it turned out to be."

Established in 1996, the company has been online since its inception, he says. "We went online before we had a printed catalogue ... We focus on ketubot only, and sell them in the U.S. and internationally."

Ketubah Ketubah is the leading seller of ketubot in North America today, says Shapiro. "The company is sitting in Canada, but 90 percent of our business is done in the U.S. It's such a niche business. The technology allows us to expand."

He attributes the company's growth partly to the fact that it is the original online ketubah source, and "partly because of our commitment to keep improving our service to our clients.

"We're always looking for new artists. We're well enough known that artists are constantly approaching us."

Most of the artists come from Canada, Israel and the United States, and work in a number of different of media, Shapiro says.

"Some ketubot are hand-painted and paper cut. Most are limited edition lithographs signed and numbered by the artist."

Styles include classic, geometric or modern, he adds. "You can choose by colour, style, artist and text."

Prices start at $100 Canadian, he adds.

Visitors can check out the selection of ketubot at the company's Web site at www.ketubah.com. The company can be reached by phone at its Toronto headquarters. Toronto residents can dial (416-9191) while out-of-town residents can call toll-free at 1-888-ketubah.

In Toronto people can come to the showroom, says Shapiro. "A lot of people visit the Web site before they visit the show room.

"We meet with customers by appointment. This way we can give them the personal attention they need."

He advises couples to meet with their rabbis to find out what text will be required on the ketubah, as there are different texts for the different denominations — Orthodox and Reform each have their own and Conservative requires the Lieberman text.

As for personalization, Shapiro says some rabbis prefer to put in the names and dates themselves. "They're in a minority, so check the rabbi's preference."

But ketubot can only be personalized if there is sufficient time for the artists and rabbi, Shapiro says.

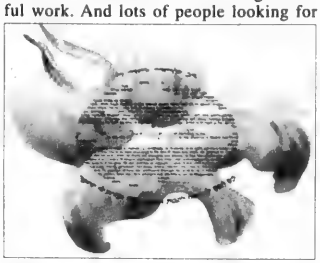
"To avoid disappointment, it's best to order two months in advance or more. Many couples choose this ahead time, place the order, have the rabbi fill in the information form and let us take care of the rest."

People need to have their names and dates written in Hebrew and Shapiro strongly recommends that the rabbi do this, "even if the bride or groom is proficient in Hebrew, just to ensure smooth sailing."

After getting his MBA, Shapiro, 35, worked for a large multinational company. After a couple of years he left the corporate world to study at the yeshiva in Jerusalem, which specializes in text studies for people of all different backgrounds.

"I always had a dream of owning my own business, and I wanted the business to be an expression of the things that I love.

"When I met my first two ketubah artists, I was moved by the work they were doing and the kind of people they were. I could see that there were a number of artists doing beautiful work. And lots of people looking for ketubot.



"And I thought, 'Why not make a shidduch between the artists and the couples, and why not have some fun a long the way?' And we do."

He says the business has contributed to making ketubot more easily available, particularly to the Canadian Jewish community.

This line of work is very satisfying, Shapiro says. "It's wonderful. We get to share in a very happy time in people's lives."

Sephardic Kehila Centre: the perfect venue

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When you choose your venue, you set the stage for your simchah. One traditional venue offering a dramatic setting is the three-year old Sephardic Kehila Centre, (905-669-7654), located at 7026 Bathurst St. in Thornhill.

"Being in the building, you're surrounded by all this exquisite architecture," says Joe Boussidan, general manager of the Sephardic Kehila Centre's operations.

The arches and circular windows are typical of the Moorish architectural style as are the mosaic tiles on the wall, which are done in blues, golds, burgundy and greens, Boussidan says.

"They were trying to recreate the old synagogues of Cordoba and Toledo... the burgundies and dark greens are reminiscent of these old synagogues."

The detailing in the design and colors reflect the Sephardi community's Spanish and North African roots, Boussidan says. He describes the setting as "very spectacular," from the large two-storey foyer with its pillars and intricate inlaid Italian marble floors to the sanctuary "featuring an awesome dome ceiling with a beautiful painting of the Magen David inside and exquisite stained windows depicting the Twelve Tribes of Israel."

And then there is the "striking" banquet hall, which can accommodate up to 500 guests, he says.

"The banquet hall is adorned with three very large chandeliers made from crystals and gold trimming.

"The ceiling was designed to replicate the night sky. It's painted blue and the light bulbs were designed to duplicate stars. When the lights are dimmed, a person feels like they're in the outdoors with stars sparkling."

But the Sephardic Kehila Centre is more than just a pretty place, Joe says.

"The catering offers the general public gourmet catering that is constantly updated to meet the trends and the food styling of the five-star banquet market.

"We do that by working within a network of chefs. Each of them specializes in their own area and excels in their own area. The combined result is the final product for the catered affair."

The caterers have been operating for eight months and will launch officially with a big open house in early September, Boussidan says.

The Kehila Centre is unique in that instead of using an outside caterer it employs its own in-house chefs, he explains.

"This was the way to offer the best.," he says. "We wanted to change the face of kosher catering, first of all, by supplying more dramatic presentation with hors d'ouevres.

"We feature lots of stations... The trend now is to prepare food live and this creates more drama and the client very much enjoys it because it's more animated."

People have been pleased with this new presentation, he says.

"The reception has been overwhelming in terms of all the elements it adds to the cocktail portion of the event."

He boasts delicious main course fare as well. "Our mandate is that we offer the client quality ingredients, generous portions, outstanding presentation, all created with expert technique.

"The food is cooked just before the client is about to eat. There's no rewarming of a chicken breast or fillet of beef. All the juices and seasonings are intact. The response has been overwhelming. The food is juicy and fresh."

Dinner packages, which start at $77 plus tax and gratuities, include five appetizers, salad or soup, the main course with two side dishes, dessert and a sweet table, Boussidan says.

The most popular main course, he says, is the grilled pesto chicken and beef with shiitake demi-glazed.

"They are served as a combination. Most people wanted to offer their guests both chicken and beef."

Another popular main course is Beef Tournedos, he says.

"We use the eye of the fillet. It's the most tender part of the beef. We buy the beef and we age it. Aging it allows for a very tender and pleasant experience on the pallet and the jaws. We marinate it for 48 hours," Boussidan says.

After the roast is cooked, it is sliced just before serving; the dish is finished with a choice of onion, port wine or mushroom demi-glaze.

A favoured salad is the Tuscan bread salad, he says.

Commonly requested desserts, he says, are fresh berries in a champagne sabayon sauce or mango and raspberry sorbet served in a chocolate cup.

"Nobody wants cake for dessert because our sweet table is overflowing with cakes. The typical sweet table has assorted tortes, flans and cakes, petits fours and fruit platters."

Boussidan attends the initial meeting with the clients, he says. "Our staff of assistants walk the clients through the whole process. We can also direct them to other services."

Party props with lasting beauty

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

If your celebration is a milestone event, like a wedding or a bar or bat mitzvah, you want to have something by which to remember it. It's been said, however, that once a party's over, the only permanent mementos are the photos and the video.

To these, you can now add a durable wood-and-etched glass sculpture or centrepiece, made by Caroline Keane of Party Props (905-726-8878). While she creates many kinds of props, this is one of her favourites.

Keane uses only her own templates. Each sculpture is unique, makes an excellent keepsake or gift, and can be personalized. And while she loves the creative challenge posed by each new piece, she also enjoys seeing how they please her customers.

Each piece consists of two panels of glass. On each panel, Keane etches an image with hydrochloric acid in cream form. Or, to be more accurate, she etches the background, which is frosted. The image itself is left clear.

Then Keane scrapes the acid off for re-use. Nothing is wasted. With a scrub brush and dishwashing soap, she cleans the glass while running it under very hot water. The clear area, where the image is located, is cleaned with extra care so it doesn't streak. Sometimes Keane outlines it with a gold leaf or silver pen.

Usually the panels are angular, in the shape of a rectangle, square or diamond, with the edges ground smooth so as to be safe. Each panel is set upright in its own sturdy stand. The wooden base is usually varnished in a subdued colour like black lacquer or burgundy.

The glass panels are then set parallel, about three inches apart. Between them are one to three candles that fit in a votive holder. The candlelight passing through the glass heightens the contrast between the clear image and frosted background. These sculptures show best after dark, in a dimly lit room.

The design or image can be anything you want, from Celtic filigree to a simple silhouette. On one occasion, for a surprise birthday party, Keane made car images portraying a range of models: an early flivver, a classy touring auto, and a racy sports car. Three of these were auctioned, and the money was given to charity.

Party Props is a home-based business. Keane works out of her basement studio. While these sculptures are ideal for a bar or bat mitzvah, she also does corporate work.

The glass-and-wood sculptures should be ordered about a month in advance.

Keane works with balloons and styrofoam as well, which don't need so much advance notice. Give her time to be creative, in any case. That makes the work more fun for her – and for you.

Come on, celebrate at a banquet hall

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

There's a party goin' on right here
A celebration to last throughout the years
So bring your good times, and your laughter too
We gonna celebrate your party with you
— Kool and the Gang

Looking for a place to celebrate good times? Come on over to Eclipse (905-474-9930) or Acrobat (416-489-1105), two of Toronto's great venues for bar mitzvahs and engagement parties.

Eclipse, formerly known as Hank's Diner, is a newly renovated 4,000-square-foot hall that has hosted over 850 bar mitzvahs in its 15 year history.

Described by manager Peter Andreakos as "a party room with a touch of class," Eclipse has a large dance floor, a stage and a foyer, and can accommodate up to 200 guests.

Situated at Woodbine and John, their parking lot holds 350 vehicles.

President of the International Special Events Society, Karen Eluck, has described Acrobat as a "hidden gem."

With its crimson walls and elegant decor, events co-ordinator Dalia Lenskis says Acrobat has "a rich and warm ambience that is unique from other venues."

Acrobat has the capacity to hold 180 people for dinner and dancing, and 300 people for a cocktail party.

While neither Eclipse or Acrobat has a kosher kitchen, certain accommodations can be made.

Lenskis says that many clients who want a kosher-style menu opt to serve dairy.

"If you're kosher, we can also serve fish and pasta," she adds.

Eclipse provides kosher meals upon request, but, says Andreakos, "we are working towards getting a kosher caterer."

Andreakos says their per person price varies between $25 and $60.

Lenskis elaborates: "Prices are based on the season, whether your party is during the day or at night, whether it's on a Saturday, and what menu you choose."

May and June are the busiest, and thus the most expensive months, while evening parties on Saturday nights are more costly than parties held during the day or on Sundays, for example.

Acrobat is now booking into 2002, and Eclipse is taking reservations for 2003. So go ahead and call – you know you're gonna celebrate and have a good time!

Give your palate a taste of the exotic

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Today, especially in multicultural cities like Toronto, we eat foods that once were considerd "foreign," such as sushi. If we like things exotic we see eating as a learning experience. At the same time, we want our food to be healthful for the body.

Together, these factors make us want to know more about whatever we eat and drink.

About wine, for example. Whether it's from Israel or France, mentioned in the Bible or sold on LLBO shelves, it's made from grapes — right?

Sure, you've tasted home vintages like cherry or dandelion wine; but conventional wisdom insists that "real" wine comes from grapes.

Not necessarily. There's a new interest in fruit and wildberry wines, says Larry Stephan of Rodriguez Wines in Markland, Newfoundland (1-709-677-2558); and this company is at the forefront of a long-term movement.

In 1993, dentist Hilary Rodriguez made 300 cases of blueberry wine, and sold out in two weeks. Since then, the winery has gone from one variety to eight; while it received some initial government help, it's starting to pay for itself. It sells to four provinces, as well as Japan, the U.K. and the U.S.

There are semi-sweet and dry blueberry wines; a lingonberry wine; a Barrens blend of lingonberry and blueberry; a cloudberry wine; and strawberry, raspberry and plum vintages, from a pesticide-free organic farm. All but cloudberry, raspberry and plum are available in LLBO stores.

The blueberries, lingonberries and cloudberries grow wild. Lingonberries, called partridge berries in Newfoundland, are indigenous to northern climates; so are cloudberries.

Flavours range from off-dry to semi-sweet. Blueberry, lingonberry and the Barrens blend go with fish, fowl and wild game; the others are for sipping or dessert. To enhance bouquet and flavour, they should all be chilled.

Most of the wines are red, but without sulphites, so they won't cause headaches. They're good for three to four years, and have 10 to 11 percent alcohol. Blueberries and lingonberries have plenty of Vitamin C, and the world's highest content of cancer-fighting anti-oxidants.

Rodriguez makes its wines year-round, from flash-frozen berries in large quantities. Flash-freezing, by breaking proteins down and releasing molecules, also enhances the taste.

Rodriguez wines are now kosher, approved by the Orthodox Union of Jewish Congregations of America, and also kosher for Passover (OUP). And they have Canadian certification under COR.

Sushi and wine may seem as far apart as Japan and Newfoundland. However, Spencer Woodrow of Umami Sushi (416-782-3375) shares Rodriguez' insistence on quality ingredients and preparation.

Woodrow has made sushi at home for 17 years. For consistent high quality, he advises, buy from a small, hands-on operator. To hold onto his niche in the market, he has to be attentive and personable, yet come up with fresh ideas that set him apart from purveyors of standardized goods and services.

Umami Sushi, a wholesaler and caterer, sells through four retailers. They also have a portable bar, with a moat for sushi boats. The company works with other caterers, handles all aspects of the sushi part of your function, and caters only kosher products.

Especially with exotic delicacies, urges Woodrow, don't let the unusual character of the food distract you from your quest for quality. He takes pride in making and serving everything fresh daily, from the best ingredients. They offer vegetarian products, as well as cooked, smoked or raw fish.

With foods from other cultures, you may want to learn the meaning of a few basic terms. Here are some that pertain to sushi:

A maki is a small roll of rice, wrapped in a tangy seaweed called nori.

A nigiri is a piece of fish on a bed of rice.

For the bar, advises Woodrow, book a few days ahead; for specialty platters, the night before. And you can visit the Web site at umamisushi.com.

PARTY PLANNER

Roll the Tape!- Recording Your Party In Style

By MICHAEL SPIAR
Special to The CJN

When you host a party, you don't want to get stuck behind a camera. People want to take part in the action, not be an impartial observer.

Abe Salzman of Video Affairs (905-889-0909) has been in videography since 1981 and has personally recorded over 1,000 events. He has insight into the intricacies of recording a party.

Paul Laszlo is another videographer, operating Twins (905-660-7385) alongside his brother. Laszlo's experience is comparable to that of Salzman, as they are former partners in the field.

"First, I believe if someone is having a party, they would want to enjoy it themselves, not work at videotaping it," Salzman says.

As well, when people personally record their parties, they don't have all of the specialized equipment that a professional has access to.

A professional will know how best to work with the lighting schemes of the party location and use specialized microphones and wireless equipment. As well, a professional can move about and record the event without interfering with the guests, whereas an untrained cameraman may not be able to do so as well.

With any videographer, "clients should look for perfect quality, colour and sound, as well as making sure that everything was captured creatively. Even the smallest details, such as decorations, centrepieces, and the sweet table should be exciting to watch if videotaped and edited tastefully. Comments and emotions from guests make it a truly memorable keepsake."

As well, when the final copy of the video is being edited, clients have the opportunity to look at the raw footage and decide which scenes they would like to keep and which to cut. Usually, the footage is left as is unless the client requests that it be trimmed.

The client may also decide how many special effects they want in the video, if any, and they get to pick which ones. The final version of the video is made to suit each client's tastes and preferences.

While many videographers prefer to use a tripod-mounted camera, Salzman likes a shoulder-carried model, which allows him to be wherever he has to be at any given moment.

"Since [my camera is] totally portable and does not need to be plugged into power, I can be right next to people on the dance floor, even if they choose to dance far away."

Creativity is a must with professional videography, and being mobile allows for different camera angles, which can make the video more exciting.

Typically, videographers use one camera per party. The final video can give the illusion of having had multiple cameras through clever use of angles and lighting, but clients can request that a second cameraman be assigned to the job. However, it is entirely possible to film a party with 600 guests and still catch everything using only one.

It is best to book a videographer a year in advance, especially if you want the owner to do it personally.

Save time and tzuris: Register

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

In planning a wedding or other big celebration, anything that saves time and tzuris is an advantage. And concerning the major advantages of a gift registry, Gisella Goodman of Goodman's China (905-731-3564), and Suzanne Savage of The Bay (1-877-408-1510), are of one mind.

With a registry, you select items that match your decor, tastes and lifestyle. Then the retailer takes care of informing you as to which items have been bought, and which have not. This makes it easy to exchange, to eliminate duplication (say, if you get too many vases), and to complete sets such as flatware. And guests appreciate not having to worry about what to buy.

Savage stresses the advantage of different price points, so people with different budgets can purchase what you want. Guests who are students, for instance, can choose a level they can afford, while guests who want to spend more, can.

If not everything you want is purchased by the wedding day, a registry lets you finish sets over a period of time. If you yourself are on a moderate budget, this is especially helpful. And since you don't lose your credit, you can let friends or relatives use it.

New technology extends these benefits. As an example, Savage cites online buying, which makes gift buying much easier for people from out of town.

Your consultant, emphasizes Savage, is an adviser on matters of personal import, such as what gifts to choose, in what designs and number. Hence, she has to ask many personal questions about your home and lifestyle, and she needs detailed answers. So select her with care, looking for rapport and trustworthiness.

She needs to know how you plan to entertain (how many guests, formally or informally, etc.) and whether you keep kosher, since if you do, you'll want meat and dairy dishes, and extra sets for Passover.

Household items and keepsakes are customary for weddings; bathroom items, kitchenware and glassware, for showers; keepsakes, and decorative pieces, such as crystal vases, for engagements.

Also, Savage adds, consider who your guests are and how they think. Many older people tend to buy keepsake gifts. Younger people, by contrast, often think of utility and convenience (e.g. items like microwaves).

Social trends affect registry use, too. We still speak of "bridal registries," but Goodman sees a lot more grooms coming in, especially for the first meeting.

Should you use the convenience of a one-stop registry, or the product knowledge of specialized retailers for different gifts?

There are two sides to this argument. Here too, you must consider your guests. Some guests like big stores with everything under one roof, while others prefer boutiques. In any case, pick well-organized retailers with lots of variety and excellent service.

Goodman also raises the issue of service. With some registries, items are delivered and gift-wrapped one by one as they're bought. With others, the bride is notified of what's been bought, but the item stays in the store until the wedding day.

Goodman favours this second, or "notification," system, as it decreases risk, cost and inefficiency. You don't buy items like place settings one by one, after all, and it's cheaper and safer to move eight settings in bulk than one at a time.

Register three to six months ahead, Savage advises – the more guests and gifts, the earlier. Above all, do so before the rush of the last three months when you'll have plenty of other things to keep you occupied.

Goodman advocates registering as soon as you get engaged. Not only does this cut down on what you'll have to do closer to the big day when things can get hectic, but it also helps relatives and friends who want to buy gifts right away.

If you get engaged a year before the wedding, though, Goodman continues, come in two or three weeks before to see if you want to revise your selection. New patterns can come on the market, old lines can be discontinued, and your tastes may change.

Gifts more personal, show thoughtfulness

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

Summer is a popular season for simchahs, and while host families are no doubt frazzled about the big day, it is also common for guests to be stressed out about what gifts they should give.

The CJN turned to two shops in the GTA for some creative gift ideas, and some advice on how much you should be spending.

Wynter Rosen, the creative and business mind behind Wynter Rosen Designs (416-481-2328), has been manufacturing, wholesaling and retailing hand-painted customized ceramics for the past four years.

"Our designs are funky, different, and of the highest quality," Rosen says. "We bend over backward for our customers, whether it means wrapping the gifts we produce or delivering them."

If you're attending a bar or bat mitzvah, Rosen suggests spending between $50 and $150, depending on how close you are to the host family.

"If you're an acquaintance, you should probably spend about $50. A hand painted tzedakah box or a kiddush cup are nice gifts and they fall into this price range," Rosen says.

"If you're a close friend or relative, a custom plate is a good idea and they cost between $60 and $90," she adds, noting that some excellent ideas for wedding presents include a wedding plate, kiddush cup, Shabbat candle holders or a challah plate.

"You can also bring in a picture and we can transpose it onto the ceramic to make a personalized gift, or you can come in to our studio and paint your own ceramic piece," says Rosen.

Edna Sandler Judaica (416-633-6801) is a mother-and-daughter shop specializing in original products handcrafted using the finest quality fabrics.

Inspired by Jewish themes, they employ techniques such as applique, stitchery, off-loom weaving and painting on silk using colours ranging from vibrant jewel to subtle pastels and neutral tones.

Desirée Farkas, who works on the general construction of gifts, while her daughter, Edna, designs them, finds that the most popular gift for bar mitzvahs is a new tallit.

"Women of all ages having their bat mitzvahs order custom-made tallitot too," Farkas says.

Prices for a personalized tallit range from $240 to $500, which also includes a tallit bag and a kippah.

In business together for five years now, the pair has begun to branch out.

Handmade chupahs cost anywhere from $300 to $1,500, while rented handheld chupahs are $300, and rented free-standing chupahs are $500.

If you are not as close to the host family, challah or matzah covers are also good wedding gifts, and they sell for $140, though there are a few in stock for $95.

Farkas recommends ordering a personalized gift two to six weeks in advance, depending on what gift you've chosen to give.

If you want to order a custom made product from Wynter Rosen Designs, Rosen tells customers to order two to three weeks ahead, but "sometimes you can get a custom made gift on the spot if you just want to add a name."

So why should you consider giving a gift instead of money?

"It's more personal," Farkas says. "It also serves as a reminder of the person who gave it to you."

Rosen agrees. "When you've taken the time to come in and pick something out, it shows that you've put a lot of thought into the gift. It's more sentimental, and a keepsake will last forever," she says.

Mandell Entertainment — it keeps growing and growing...

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Twelve years ago, Corey Mandell tried disc-jockey work for a lark. He discovered that he loved being the life of the party. And on top of that he was getting paid for having fun.

Mandell had a knack for schmoozing and a unique way of interacting with the guests and soon people began requesting him at their parties.

After a couple of years he set up his own business on a shoe string. He had only one employee.

Now in its 10th year, the Mandell Entertainment Group (905-886-4000) has grown into an entertainment conglomerate with 400 full and part-time employees working in the decor, amusement and production divisions.

"We're the largest DJ company in Canada," says Mandell, 30. "We operate across Canada and do events in the States on a regular basis."

Just in one year his staff grew by about 25 percent from last year, he said. Mandell, in a partnership with three others – Michael Landsberg, Gary Eisen, and Michael Kleinman— launched the Capitol Event Theatre in 1999. Now they're set to open a second event venue in the Eglinton and Yonge area at the end of the year, and they're working on a third location further north, Mandell said.

And there have been other new developments. He recently launched a bar mitzvah band, a six-piece group offering live music with interaction.

"The whole band interacts. They're booked every weekend. They play Jennifer Lopez, Brittney Spears. They're very contemporary."

And he's pleased with people's response to the band. "People have found it refreshing. Finally there was a band playing the music the kids like. Most bands tend to play music mainly geared to adults."

The Richmond Hill office also offers dance classes in the studio four to five times a week that draws between 15 and 30 dance studio kids per class, he said.

"We offer private classes for break dancing. Families also come in before their parties to learn routines."

The Mandell Entertainment Group Amusements (MEGA) has a large inventory of inflatable games — such as the Jurassic Park obstacle course — novelty food rental and digital novelties, he said. "We can put a photo on an aluminum dog tag, ink stamp, or water bottle."

Despite the many changes in the company, some things have remained the same. The DJs still do the summer camp tour summer tour sponsored by Roots and Mandell is still an employee at Camp Timberlane.

"I help out [at camp] where I can," he said. "All my ideas from what I've been able to develop have been through camping."

And on any given Saturday night you can find him kibitzing at a bar or bat mitzvah getting people off their chairs and onto the dance floor

"I still perform every weekend," he said. "It's important for me to perform. I am able to stay in tune with the industry. I still love doing it. I still love what I do."

"People want a big show. They want something different. We have been offering them that. That's why we're in our 10th year."

Corey Mandell

Lots of fun

They are greeted by a real live look-alike Barbie in a pink ball gown and two Barbies are on hand to do the party guests' make-up hair, manicure and glitter.

And when everybody is dressed to the nines they are ready for the elegant tea party in the pink dining room. "It's kind of like you going to a formal party at Palace of Versailles and ending up having tea with the royal family.

"There is pink carpeting, pink draperies, pink Victorian furniture, a three pedestal antique table with matching chairs. We use fancy china, linen napkins."

People bring their own food and and there are Barbie-themed paper plates for kosher guests, she says.

While the party can accommodate some boys, it's best suited to girls, Rabow said.

And of course the adults get into the party fun by dressing up too, she says, noting that she carries ball gowns for every size and figure, even for nine-month pregnant women.

"Most of the moms are wearing sparkly strapless gowns and real princess tiaras. The dads dress up too. Most dress like a king. We've even had Mark Messier dressed up as a bride."

The girl dress up as princesses, brides, Brittney Spears or the Spice Girls, but they go through at least eight different outfits before choosing one for the tea party and so Ragow strongly recommends that the parents bring a lot of film.

She stresses that they give a strong message of self acceptance to the girls, telling them "they're beautiful just the way they are. All we're doing is adding some sparkle and glamour for a special occasion — a special little girl's birthday party."

Jewelry: A great gift for the one you love

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

George Klein of George Klein Creations (416-730-1755), and Michel Korman of Laurentian Jewellers Ltd. (416-782-3588), agree that buying jewelry is not a casual choice. Not that it's always bad to heed an impulse, when it's the spontaneous upsurge of love for the receiver of the gift. The final decision, though, should be carefully weighed.

After 36 years, Klein isn't bored with his work. 80 percent of it is design or custom work, the part he likes best, which he does himself. He also takes great pleasure in a high level of customer satisfaction.

Korman has his custom work done in a Montreal factory. He does original work, and re-creates exsisting designs. Klein recommends craft work, instead of something off the shelf: jewelry is for a special person on a special occasion. Choose a jeweller who gives your gift his devoted personal attention.

You have to spend money, Klein observes, so make it count. At the same time, Korman warns against assuming that jewelry is expensve, not everything is a $1,000 item. There are plenty of fine pieces for under $100, even as low as $50. Don't confuse cost with value.

Before you buy your gift, Korman believes you should consider whether it's short- or long- term. This is especially important when buying for a pre-teen or teenager: is the ring, brooch, etc. to be worn just when they're in this age group, or longer thereafter?

Order at least a month ahead, Klein insists, especially if you want a design created. Korman advises three weeks ahead. If you want something for October, November or December, though, he suggests placing your order a bit earlier: his busiest time is usually the end of the year.

"A diamond is forever": for Klein, the cliché holds true. Korman qualifies this, pointing out that jewelry needs care. Metals, especially soft precious metals, wear down or out of shape. The claws which hold a diamond in a ring, for example, need to be re-tipped from time to time.

For proper cleaning and care, Korman urges, bring your jewelry to your jeweller every two to six months. He has special machinery, as well as better cleansers than you can buy in the store; and he knows how to handle the stones and metals.

Men, says Klein, still do some of the buying, but 90 percent of his customers are ladies. In the old days, the man came and bought the engagement or wedding ring; now he brings the lady. And in Klein's personal experience, at least, the old conventions about specific gifts for specific occasions are dissolving.

Platinum and white gold (gold alloyed with nickel, zinc or silver) are still strong, Korman says. So is antique styling with filigree for rings and bracelets, even for new work. With summer coming, bringing brighter clothes and colours, Korman also forecasts more interest in semi- precious stones like amethyst, blue topaz and citron topaz. The strong summer light shows jewelry to good advantage.

Dressing well is a sign of respect, Korman says

excesses of casual Friday.

The committee's aim is to raise standards generally, not just on Thursdays; and the idea is contagious.

Everyone's dressing up, from Michael Jordan's Washington Bullets to President Bush. And while casual Friday is here to stay, it's becoming dressier and more tailored, with sport jackets, sport shirts and mock sweaters.

So just what is it about a suit, that makes it special?

Past cultures' formalwear conferred status and dignity, but often at cost of ease and confort. The Roman toga took half an hour to don with a servant's aid; and you couldn't move quickly or easily in it without undoing the folds. About the only thing you could do in a toga, was make speeches.

Today's business suit is tailored for action. It's confortable, easy to put on, and easy to move in. In it, you can make a speech, work at a terminal, eat lunch, or walk briskly down a corridor.

Dressing well, Korman maintains. is a matter of respect – for yourself, the people you're with, and the occasion. You wear a tuxedo to a wedding, for example, because it's a unqiue, milestone event; the tux sets it apart from the everyday.

Order your suit six to seven weeks in advance, advises Korman. Buy an all-purpose colour, say navy, so it can be worn wherever a suit is appropriate; and choose a year-round fabric comfortable in any season. And remember that nothing is as important as the craft work.

Korman emphasizes that you have to trust your retailer. While this is partly a matter of rapport, he also mentions some specifics. Never shop where it says "exchange only." Insist on a guarantee that your money can be refunded.

Ottawa proclaims Wallenberg Day

By DIANE KOVEN
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Sixteen years after he was named Canada's only honorary citizen, the federal government has proclaimed Jan. 17 as Raoul Wallenberg Day.

The historic move, announced earlier this month at a special reception on Parliament Hill, will pay tribute to the Swedish World War II hero who rescued more Jews from certain death than any single government.

"In honouring Raoul Wallenberg each year on Jan. 17, we will honour the courage, character and humanity of an exceptional individual," said Canadian Heritage Minister Sheila Copps at the June 5 reception. "Raoul Wallenberg Day will ensure that this man's heroism will live on in posterity."

In 1944, Wallenberg, scion of a wealthy Swedish banking family, was dispatched to Budapest as a diplomat to save as many Jews as possible from the Nazi death machine. In a matter of months, he printed and distributed thousands of fake Swedish passports, called Schutzpasses, which placed holders under the protection of the neutral Swedish government.

He also persuaded the Nazis to call off the destruction of Budapest's Jewish ghetto, with its

Maccabiah decision pending

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — More than 300 Canadian athletes and coaches – as well as thousands of Jewish sportsmen and women from around the world – were on tenterhooks last week as officials met in Israel to discuss whether to postpone next month's Maccabiah Games.

Fear of terrorist attack, as well as the growing number of athletes who have pulled out of the Games, have led to reports that organizers are considering all options, including postponement or even cancellation of the Games.

Members of the international executive of the Maccabi World Union (MWU), along with Israel's Minister of Science, Culture and Sport, Matan Vilna'i, held two days of meetings on the weekend to discuss the 16th games, scheduled to run from July 16 to 26.

The News in Brief

Canada

Rabbis Support Credit

TORONTO — The Toronto Board of Rabbis and the Vaad Harabonim have both designated this Shabbat (June 16) as a day on which rabbis will publicly support the Ontario government's tax credits for parents of children in private schools and encourage their congregants to do likewise. In a letter to Premier Mike Harris and Finance Minister Jim Flaherty, Vaad president Rabbi Dovid Schochet thanks the government for its initiative, which will begin "to eliminate the discrimination that characterizes the current system." In its letter to Harris and Flaherty, the Toronto Board of Rabbis praises the government's "bold initiative," and pledges that its rabbis will express support for the measure from the pulpit this Saturday.

Aid to Palestinians

OTTAWA — The federal government last week rejected a suggestion by the Canadian Alliance to tie Canada's aid to Palestinians to their willingness to hold peace talks with Israel. The Alliance idea had come from MP Monte Solberg, upsetting Canadian Arab and Muslim groups. Canada provides about $6.5 million in annual aid to the Palestinian Authority.

Israel

Heart Transplant

JERUSALEM — An Israeli man has received a heart transplant from a Palestinian man who was recently shot dead in disputed circumstances near Jerusalem. The co-ordinator of Israel's national transplant association said it was the first organ donation by a Palestinian since the outbreak of violence last September.

Rescuers Suffer

JERUSALEM — Some rescue workers who helped evacuate the wounded and dead following the May 24 wedding hall collapse here are suffering from depression, stress and insomnia, and are complaining that they have not received the necessary psychological care, according to the Jerusalem Post.

Hotels Spurn MKs

JERUSALEM— Leading hotels here have said they are no longer extending courtesies and other perks to Knesset members who are their guests, charging the government is ignoring the "crisis" in tourism.

World

Call for Fatwa

WASHINGTON — The Simon Wiesenthal Centre has called on leading Muslim clerics to issue a fatwa, or religious edict, against suicide bombings. Rabbi Marvin Hier, the centre's dean and founder, said most Muslim clerics are too fearful to issue such rulings, though some have said the bombings do not reflect the true tenets of Islam.

Sharon Allegations

BRUSSELS — A Belgian magistrate has began examining a request for Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to be tried for crimes against humanity. Two people described as being "of Arab descent" filed the request under a 1993 law, which allows Belgian courts to prosecute foreign officials for human rights violations committed outside Belgium.

Zuckerman Wins

NEW YORK — Mortimer Zuckerman emerged victorious last week from a contentious campaign to lead the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations. Zuckerman, the Montreal-born real estate mogul and publisher of the New York Daily News and U.S. News & World Report, succeeds Ronald Lauder.

Romania Rapped

NEW YORK — The Anti-Defamation League has slammed Romania for continuing to sanction monuments honouring the nation's wartime dictator and Nazi ally, Marshall Ion Antonescu. The criticism followed reports that Romanian military officials and right-wing politician Corneliu Vadim Tudor attended the unveiling of a bust of Antonescu in the courtyard of a Bucharest church.

Oppose Compensation

VIENNA — Nearly 50 percent of Austrians oppose their government's decision to compensate Holocaust victims, according to a new poll. In the survey of 2,000 Austrians older than 14 years, 45 percent disapprove of their government's decision in January to establish a $310-million compensation fund for Austrian victims of the Holocaust. The same percentage believe Jews are exploiting Nazi horrors for their own gain.

Speaking Engagements Cancelled

TORONTO — A local Unitarian Church last week cancelled the second of two speaking engagements of a notorious British anti-Semite after it learned the venue had been booked under false pretenses.

A group calling itself CVA Seminars had booked a room in the First Unitarian Congregation under the pretext of holding an investment seminar for seniors. However, the speaker turned out to be David Icke, author of wild conspiracy theories that include the view that Jews are descended from extraterrestrial lizards.

Eustace Mullins, a veteran anti-Semite from West Virginia, had also been booked to appear with Icke on a speaking tour in Montreal and Toronto, but he pulled out when news of the tour appeared in the media.

Mullins has been dogged by cancellations of his Canadian speaking engagements this year. His planned appearance at a Toronto health seminar in March was cancelled after the show's sponsors threatened to withdraw their support. The initial speaking venue on the current tour, booked from the Lithuanian Community Association of Toronto, was pulled after the group learned of Mullins' background.

Mullins' published work includes rehashes of medieval blood libels that charge Jews with killing Christian children for ritual purposes.

In the wake of the incidents, Liberal MPP Michael Bryant wrote to Attorney General David Young, asking what the government is doing to prevent or investigate potential hate crimes.

Birthright trip departs with smaller group

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A surge of last-minute cancellations reduced their numbers, but 570 young Jews from across Canada refused to let security concerns stand in the way of their participation in last week's Birthright flights to Israel.

Professing confidence in security measures promised them, participants interviewed by The CJN said they felt safe travelling to Israel even in the midst of Palestinian terror attacks.

However, 150 young people – 21 percent of those who had registered for the program – either cancelled or were no-shows at Toronto's Pearson Airport, about what organizers expected given recent attacks in Israel, including the suicide bombing in Tel Aviv that killed 21 young people at a nightclub.

Concerns over safety were the reasons most often cited for not travelling to Israel, and while the Birthright program went ahead as scheduled, other groups planning Israel missions are scaling back or seeing their programs cancelled outright.

As of press time, the Maccabiah Games, a sporting event that attracts 4,000 Jewish athletes from around the world, was in jeopardy of being postponed for a year, while dozens of Canadian athletes – about 20 percent of the total – had removed themselves from the team. Canada had been planning to send more than 300 athletes, coaches and other personnel to the Games.

In Cleveland, the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC), a Reform organization, announced it was suspending all teen programs to Israel this summer, affecting 1,500 mostly American teenagers, along with a handful of Canadians.

In Ottawa, the Shira Choir cancelled its participation in the Zimria choir fest, held in Israel every three years. About 50 people were affected.

Other organizations, including the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) were continuing with their summer Israel programs, but with drastically curtailed numbers.

Stanley Morais, a spokesman for El Al Israel Airlines, said Canadian bookings are down 40 percent from last year. The summer high season, in which flights are usually more than 90 percent booked, are expected to depart only 70 full, he said.

In New York, Hillel, the Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, the largest provider of Birthright Israel trips in the United States, postponed two of its early June trips, affecting 120 students.

In Cleveland, meanwhile, UAHC president Rabbi Eric Yoffie told the organization's board of trustees, "While I think we can offer a safe trip, I simply do not have the degree of confidence that I normally have… in order to be able to tell our congregations and parents that they can trust us to keep their children secure."

In Ottawa, Nancy Bercovich, president of the Canadian Council of Reform Judaism and a member of the UAHC board, said, "It was not an easy decision to make." Of the more than 200 board representatives at the Cleveland meeting, only two voiced opposition to the decision, she said.

For many, the announcement was purely academic. UAHC's NIFTY program, which generally attracts 40 youngsters from the Greater Toronto Area, had only three bookings this year, UAHC sources in New York stated.

A prescription for U.S., us

Last week, in Denver, I attended the annual meeting of the American Jewish Press Association (AJPA), a gathering of nearly 100 journalists and publishing business professionals.

The Association was founded in 1944 for the overall purpose of "promoting the survival, interests and improved standards and quality of the Jewish media" in North America. Some 200 media individuals, publications and organizations, of which three are Canadian, are part of the Association umbrella.

The gathering is geared to renewing old acquaintances and friendships and to forging new ones. These acquaintances and friendships are indispensable in helping to contend with the unforeseeable deadline exigencies that arise frequently during the publication of a weekly newspaper, especially a Jewish one.

The gathering is also geared to the exchange of ideas, opinions and information regarding recent publishing-related developments and the myriad substantive issues that concern readers of the Jewish media.

The conference organizers always invite experts at the top of their respective fields to speak to the conference audience. One of the experts this year was Prof. Jonathan Sarna, a historian from Brandeis University.

Sarna is slight and lean, yet he delivers his remarks with high-intensity energy. When he speaks, he often furrows his brow and projects his words with George Jessel-like boom and bass. He is a powerful lecturer.

Sarna spoke to the group on the future of the Jewish press. One of his main goals, he implied, was to impress upon us the Jewish media's potential in helping shape the lives of the Jews of America for the better. (Sarna did not know there was a Canadian in the audience. Yet even though his remarks were restricted to the American Jewish condition, all of what he said was of enormous interest, if not always of relevance, to the Canadian Jewish condition.)

In particular, Sarna pleaded that Jewish newspapers take their "educational missions" more seriously. More American Jews, Sarna pointed out, read their weekly, bi-weekly, or monthly Jewish newspapers than they do the weekly Torah portion, attend shul regularly, or listen to a rabbi's sermon.

In contemplating the future of the Jewish press, Sarna emphasized that the American Jewish community must take into account five important, immediate issues:

• Demographics. For the first time since the colonial period, the American Jewish population will soon shrink in absolute and relative terms. "This will be a big shock," Sarna warned.

Currently, there are approximately 22 Jews for every 1,000 Americans. (This is almost twice the ratio in Canada, which stands at about 12 Jews for every 1,000 Canadians.) But the Jewish community, with a birth rate of 1.6 to 1.7, is below the necessary replacement birth rate level of 2.1. This distinctly measurable decline in the size of the Jewish community, Sarna emphasized, contrasts with the equally distinct rise in the size of the Evangelical and Roman Catholic communities.

• Intermarriage. Irrespective of the fact that the community has not reached a consensus on the subject of intermarriage – potentially catastrophic or potentially remedial of the ongoing decline in Jewish numbers, it is indisputable that "a vast number of Americans today are related to Jews." Sarna believes "It is important for the community to reach them."

• Disjunction between the image of the Diaspora and the reality. "The Diaspora has shrunk enormously," Sarna told us. The Jewish world is highly concentrated geographically: 95 percent of the world's Jews live in 14 countries; in only 39 countries are there communities of 5,000 Jews or more.

• The self-image of American Jews. For the first time, more Jews live in greater Tel Aviv than in greater New York. What are the implications, Sarna challenged, for American Jewry on fund-raising and political relationships, to name but two important areas, of the diminishing role the community will inevitably play in international Jewish affairs as a result?

• The mission of American Jews. "The relationship of the Jews of America to Israel today," Sarna said, "is not the same as it was on the eve of the Six Day War." He implied the relationship is weaker; he also implied that the key causes that inspired American Jews in the latter half of the 20th century – the persecution of Jews, anti-Semitism, the Shoah and the survival of Israel – will not be as inspiring for American Jewry in the 21st century.

"American Jews," Sarna said, "are looking for some renewed sense of Jewish mission. We should not be timid. Historically, Jewish newspapers have always played a great role in educating, inspiring and helping formulate the mission of Jewish communities as our watchdogs, teachers and even prophets."

Sarna's prescription was written for the American Jewish body politic. But it is medicine that applies to the Canadian condition as well.

New chumash dedicated at RA convention

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Conservative rabbis kicked off the 101st annual Rabbinical Assembly (RA) convention, held here last week, with a celebratory dedication of a new Chumash.

The Chumash is expected to become the movement's standard for the 21st century, replacing the 65-year-old Pentateuch and Haftorahs, commonly known as the Hertz Chumash.

"Even as we worry about Israel in crisis, we come here to recognize the eternity of our teachings, of our Torah, of our tradition and of our heritage," said RA president Rabbi Vernon Kurtz, a Toronto native who now serves North Suburban Synagogue Beth El in Highland Park, Ill. He proclaimed the evening a "time for rejoicing," and highlighted the responsibility of today's generation to understand and enact the teachings of the Torah.

The publication of the new Chumash was connected to the theme of the convention, Teaching Torah in a New Century. Several sessions, including the dedication, were open to the public.

Tuesday evening, scholars taught at five different locations, from the downtown Bloor JCC, north to Associated Hebrew Schools' Kamin branch in Thornhill, as the RA's "gift to the Toronto Jewish community," said organizers.In addition to study opportunities for the 350 rabbis in attendance, the five-day meeting, which was co-chaired by Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Congregation and Rabbi Lionel Moses of Shaare Zion Congregation in Montreal, addressed a variety of practical concerns including fund-raising, involving congregants in tikkun olam, and outreach to teens.

Keynote speaker Rabbi Harold Kushner of Natick, Mass., best known as the author of When Bad Things Happen to Good People, discussed A Conservative Torah Commentary for the 21st Century, at the opening evening session held June 3 at the Inn on the Park Hotel.

As the spokesperson for approximately 50 colleagues who were involved in the Chumash project (the other high-profile editor being novelist and ordained Conservative Rabbi Chaim Potok), Rabbi Kushner called the publication of 1,588-page text "a watershed moment."

Providing historical context, Etz Hayim's senior editor Rabbi David Lieber noted that the Hertz Chumash, composed by Rabbi Joseph Hertz, then chief rabbi of the British Empire, with a team of assistants, met the needs of the time, demonstrating "that the Torah offered a way of life compatible with the new world… that was in no way inferior to that offered by the church."

That text was addressed to first or second-generation British Jews with modest Jewish and general educations, who faced "the prevalent genteel anti-Semitism and the growing influence of Nazism."

Modern-day Bible commentators are the latest in a long line dating back to the pre-Christian era, Rabbi Lieber noted, each reflecting the needs, interests and circumstances of their respective eras.

By the 1960s, he said, it was apparent that a new, more current, commentary was needed to "meet the needs of a growing, college-educated population which was secure enough in its Jewishness not to require the apologetics that characterized the Hertz commentary."

It wasn't until almost a decade ago, however, that the project, which was a joint partnership of the Jewish Publication Society, the Rabbinical Assembly and United Synagogue, got under way.

Among the attributes that make Etz Hayim unique, said Rabbi Kushner, it draws on multi-denominational sources and is "quite self-consciously a post-Holocaust commentary." He cited, for instance, the recognition of Shifra and Puah, the midwives who refused to carry out Pharaoh's order to kill male Israelite babies, as "early precursors of the righteous gentiles who risked their lives to save Jews."

The Chumash, 100,000 copies of which will be printed this summer, also breaks new ground with input from the first generation of Conservative women rabbis, co-ordinated by Rabbi Susan Grossman. "It is a much better and richer commentary for it," said Rabbi Kushner.

He referred specifically to sections on family purity as one example that has benefited from the input of women scholars.

At least in the midrashic commentary, he noted, all references to God are gender-neutral. The announcement was greeted with applause by a substantial proportion of the 350-member audience.

The text also acknowledges the "accession of thousands of Jews by choice and the degree to which they have changed the character of the Jewish people."

As well, readers can expect to find acknowledgment of troubling passages in lieu of apologetics. "Even when we are troubled by the passage we are confronting, we put it in a context that it is only because our consciences are shaped by the Torah that we are bothered by this passage."

"I think it's been an excellent convention," said Rabbi Kurtz as the conference drew to a close. "I think that colleagues have been able to share a great deal – Torah, life experiences, professional skills and a collegial sense of being together."

Although RA members include 144 women, and, generally speaking, rabbis whose positions span a wide range from pulpit rabbis to academicians, there are more commonalities than differences, said Rabbi Kurtz.

He believes the opportunity to share personal and professional issues at a forum like the convention gives the rabbis strength that they will take back to their congregations and other places of work.

According to Rabbi Frydman-Kohl and Rabbi Moses, the convention – the RA's first in Canada since 1966 – also introduced a number of rabbis from outside Canada to the level of Jewish cultural literacy and Jewish community involvement in Canada.

"I believe that over time," said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl, "that has an impact on the perception people will have and the willingness they'll have to consider the possibility of coming to serve the community in Canada."

In fact, said Rabbi Moses, some convention participants spoke to him about the viability of moving across the border.

In addition to the positive effect the new Chumash is expected to have on Torah study, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl added that "whenever rabbis study new material, they find ways to bring it back in classes, in sermons and seminars to their congregations."

'Means' test met with opposition

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish groups have rejected government suggestions that private school tax credits should be subjected to an income test.

Funding is an act of tolerance
see page 14

Limiting tax credits to those earning under $60,000 a year, as was suggested last week by some Tory MPPs, would unfairly penalize the middle class, Jewish organizations say.

"We're very opposed to any means test," said Robert Samery, president of Jewish Parents for Equality in Education Funding (JPEEF). "There's no basis on which any means test should be applied to the public good, especially in education. It's not done anywhere else in Canada."

The latest controversy over the government's proposed tax credit for parents of children in independent and private, faith-based schools was triggered by Finance Minister Jim Flaherty when he said Queen's Park will entertain any idea made during public hearings into the measure, including applying a means test to restrict credits to lower-income families.

Later, Flaherty made clear he doesn't support means testing, saying, "as finance minister, I would be reluctant to do that."

Two Conservative backbenchers, Bill Murdoch and Ted Arnott, proposed an income test so parents earning more than $60,000 a year won't qualify for the tex credit.

In a statement, Ed Morgan, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress's Ontario region, said CJC is "completely opposed" to an income cutoff, saying there is "no basis whatsoever" for it. "Education is an essential public service and must continue to be supported on a universal basis." Congress also pointed out there is no means testing for health care, another universal right.

CJC said imposing income tests "would dramatically compromise the ability of middle class families" to benefit from the initiative.

Toni Silberman, chair of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights (Ontario region) said it would be "disheartening if the government now chose to compound the inequality of funding public and Roman Catholic schools only by imposing a means test on those who, by reason of religious imperative, have no choice but to send their children to a denominational school."

Jewish groups will have their say when public hearings into the tax credit take place later this month.

The CJN takes centre stage in debates on proposed tax credits

TORONTO — The Canadian Jewish News was front and centre in last week's debates in the provincial legislature over the government's proposed private school tax credits.

Two government ministers and a backbench MPP cited The CJN during question period, in response to attacks on the credit by Liberal leader Dalton McGuinty, who is vehemently opposed to the measure.

Education Minister Janet Ecker responded to McGuinty by noting that Greg Sorbara, the Liberals' own candidate in the June 28 byelection in the riding of Vaughan-King-Aurora, "has gone on record" as supporting public funding of Jewish day schools. Ecker was referring to a 1992 CJN story in which Sorbara, a former Liberal cabinet minister, predicted that Ontario's Jewish day schools would be publicly funded by the year 2000.

It was at the 1992 ground-breaking ceremony of Associated Hebrew Schools' Kamin campus that Sorbara declared, to applause: "If we don't get it [funding] by a court decision, we'll get it by way of political decision."

Later, Finance Minister Jim Flaherty cited the same article, saying, "I guess [Sorbara] says something different today if he's going to listen to his leader, who apparently believes that he would repeal those tax credits."

Flaherty also referred to a 1994 CJN interview with Sorbara, in which Sorbara predicted that Jewish day schools would be funded, whether by government decree or court order. Sorbara also took his party to task for waffling on the issue while it was in power from 1985 to 1990.

As well, Thornhill Tory MPP Tina Molinari directly cited a 1998 CJN story, in which McGuinty was quoted as telling a meeting of Canadian Jewish Congress's Ontario region executive that he has no ideological opposition to public funding of Jewish day schools.

'Peoplehood' now at a crucible

The lying, the cowardice and finally, the renewed violence that Yasser Arafat has visited upon Israel have harmed his own suffering people – yet again – more than they have harmed the Jewish State. But ironically, in the way that history, not human beings, forces the hour of significant decision upon mankind, the Palestinians' rejection last summer of a peace treaty with Israel and the ensuing intifadah have forced the Jewish people to our own crucible of choice.

Our generation of Jews born after May 1945 now confronts the issue of Jewish peoplehood. What does it mean for us? How do we prove with our deeds the axioms that inspire our hearts?

The question begs now to be asked because of the very public pronouncement last week by Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, that the Reform Movement in the United States had cancelled all the summer tours of its youth movement in Israel. Rabbi Yoffie's decision evoked immediate condemnation and scorn from a great many quarters, including from within the Reform Movement in Israel and the United States. For example, Rabbi Mark Gellman of New York was reported in the press last week as having said, "Today I am ashamed to be part of this movement."

The most strident response to Rabbi Yoffie's pronouncement came from Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert, who said he was severing all ties with the Reform Movement.

But it has been a series of Diaspora Jewry pronouncements and decisions that now call into question our notion of peoplehood, our idea of responsibility, our understanding of Jewish history and our determination to affect the course of Jewish destiny. As of this writing, the Maccabi games, scheduled for July 16, are a question mark due to the number of cancellations by athletes; Jewish tourists have decidedly stayed away from Israel since Rosh Hashanah, the start of Arafat's campaign against Israel.

What do we really mean when we read aloud at rallies: "We are am echad, one people," or when we proclaim: "Kol Yisrael arevim zeh l'zeh; All Israel are guarantors one for the other"?

No single human being gainsays or takes lightly in any way the legitimate worries for our own, or especially, our children's safety. But is the risk to our own and our children's safety so profound, so pronounced, so certain, that it means shredding into pieces of sterile, empty, and ultimately, meaningless slogans the values and millennial aspirations that sustained prior generations of Jews through their dark times and guided their own difficult decisions at their crucibles of choice?

Are we not summoned by history and by conscience to prove to the world, to ourselves, indeed to God, that our sense of "peoplehood" is true and forever lasting and means something far more significant and stronger than any terrorist, hater of Jews could ever understand, let alone destroy?

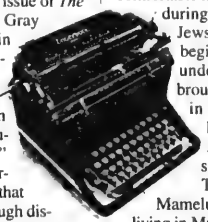
No need to justify Israel's actions

In his letter to the editor in the May 31 issue of The CJN called "Israel has strayed," Yaacov Gray is disappointed that The CJN and Jews in Canada as a whole show "blind unqualified support for Israel" and its actions. On the contary, he claims, the fact that Jews murder, abuse human rights and demolish homes should be discussed in the community at large to "broaden the perspective."



I, for one, don't want to broaden my perspective in this way. As a Jew who feels that he and his ancestors have put up with enough discrimination over the past thousands of years, I do not feel the need to justify the actions of Israel to the world, and especially not to members within my own Jewish community. If you don't like it and wish to broaden your horizons, pick up any one of the many newspapers out there that share your belief about Israel's excessive behaviour. There you'll find plenty of articles to support your viewpoint.

Is all-out war what Israel is about?

Yasher koach to Yaacov Gray for his forthright letter ("Israel has strayed," CJN, May 31). After I read the interview of Israel Danziger in the same issue, Gray's views helped calm me down.

Danziger describes problem after serious problem faced by him and his chevre in Ma'ale Adam, which is about 25 kilometres south of Bethlehem. He ends by saying that "the only solution" is "all-out war" against the PA throughout the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. I believe he's serious. This is a prime example of what Yaacov Gray means when he castigates Israel and some Israelis for "straying from the righteous path."

If Danziger and his like are facing such hardship by living outside the Green Line, why doesn't he simply go back to live in Israel? Instead, he presents us with the terrible horrors of yet another war, still greater bloodshed and endlessly ongoing violence. Is this what Israel should be all about?

I take exception to the introduction in Avner Meiri's article "60 Years since Shavuot pogrom in Baghdad" in The CJN May 24. Meiri depicts the living conditions of Jews in Iraq, presumably over the last millennium, as being "peaceful, enjoying the freedom to practise their religion and their culture."

In her well-researched book, From Time Immemorial: A history of the Arab/Jewish conflict over Palestine, Joan Peters dispels many myths, including the myth of comfortable living conditions for Jews in Muslim lands during the last 1,400 years. About the lives of Jews in Iraq during the last 1,000 years, she begins: "Capricious and extreme oppression under some Arab caliphs and Mamelukes brought taxation amounting to expropriation in AD 1000." She goes on to describe horrible events such as the pillage of Jewish synagogues in Baghdad and the slaughter of the Jews of Basra in 1776.

The troubles caused by Muslim Arabs, Mamelukes and Turks for Jews (and Christians) living in Muslim lands did not begin with the creation of Israel, nor did they begin when the first Zionist congress convened in Europe.

Seeking family info

Over the past months, I have become involved in researching my husband's family who originated in the mid-1850s in Leeds and Manchester, England.

I need to find two members of his family who I believe emigrated to Toronto in the mid 1900s, but I don't know where they settled. Their names are Esther Marcus, née Cohen, and Rudy Marcus, and their son is, I believe, Mark Marcus.

We must support Israel

I am writing this letter sitting on the plane after a wonderful two-week trip to Israel with my daughter in honour of her bat mitzvah. On the trip, which we made on her special request, we spent time with relatives and toured on our own at all times of the day in Tel Aviv, Jaffa and Jerusalem. My initial apprehensions melted very quickly upon our arrival. At no time did we feel threatened or unsafe. We comfortably walked the streets in the dark, something I cannot do in Toronto.

The joy of our trip – my daughter's first time in the Jewish State – was undermined by the lack of tourists. The museums and shops felt like ghost towns; we were sometimes the only customers. The only tours we did see were Christian ones. When I asked several Christian tourists if they were afraid to come, they said, emphatically, "No." One woman from South Carolina told me, "Now is really the time to come and show our support for Israel."

If they can show their support in this way, we – as fellow Jews – must do so, too.

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. Readers are cautioned not to make sweeping claims against persons or institutions which they cannot verify, as libel laws are very stringent. We reserve the right to edit and condense letters, which must bear the sender's address, phone number and both handwritten and typed signatures. Letters sent by e-mail must also include the sender's municipal address.

Perspectives

We are like dreamers

By RABBI BARUCH FRYDMAN-KOHL

I dream of Jerusalem. I see the streets of Katamon where I have walked and the small park in Baka where my son skinned his knee. I remember carrying the watermelon home in one arm and my little son in the other. I can see the moon above the Old City and the kite floating from the Haas-Sherover Promenade over the Kidron Valley. I can feel the cold waters of Hizkiyahu's Tunnel and the heat of the Kotel plaza on Tisha b'Av. Under Robinson's Arch, I touch the stones which fell in 70 CE and at Ammunition Hill I walk through the trenches of 1967. Jerusalem is my past, my present and my future.

War, destruction and the passage of time have left little of biblical Jerusalem. There are no palaces in the city of the great sovereign. There are few buildings of great magnificence and beauty. For many centuries, it was poor and neglected. By the year 1800, only 9,000 people lived there. Herman Melville called it a "barbarous city." Mark Twain described it as "mournful, dreary and lifeless." Years ago, the prophet Jeremiah told us, "Place Jerusalem near your heart" (51:3). We continued to dream of her, like lovers separated by time, recalling our past encounters and hoping for the moment when we might embrace again.

Isaiah prophesied, "Your eyes will see Jerusalem (32:20)." Jerusalem is not only a shrine. It is a living city, a real place with real people, an urban centre whose traffic jams are annoying, whose pollution is choking and whose litter is filthy. While most tourists recognize its wealthy neighbourhoods and high rises, Jerusalem also has slums and swindlers. Today we still love her, and dream of her, despite the problems and challenges we see, just as we treasure our own home and family.

Jerusalem is not large, as cities go. In 1869, Twain wrote that "a fast walker could go outside the walls of [the Old City of] Jerusalem and walk entirely around the city in one hour." Yet it looms large in our history, its streets reflecting a 3,000-year heritage. I have lived on Rechov Dan and Rechov Menashe, near the other tribes of ancient Israel. I have eaten in restaurants on Rechov Hanevi'im, and attended receptions on Rechov Miryam Hahashmanait, a name reflective of the Hasmonean dynasty. I have waited for buses on Rechov Binyamin miTudela, named from the Spanish period, and attended synagogue on Rechov Yehudah Halevi. I have shopped on streets named for great rabbis and others which remind me of Christian and Muslim holy teachers. I have met friends on Rechov Hamelech George, its name taken from the British Mandate period, and danced on Rechov Hapalmach, a name which tells of Jewish return, renewal and triumph. As Rav Nachman of Breslav once said, "Wherever I go, I am going to Jerusalem."

On June 7, 1967, Colonel Motta Gur announced, "Har habayit beyadeinu (The Temple Mount is ours)." Yet we were not like other conquerors. We also understood our obligation to share it. Three hours later, Defence Minister Moshe Dayan removed the Israeli flag from the Dome of the Rock and withdrew paratroopers from the area of the Haram al-Sharif. On June 17, Dayan returned functional control of the Temple Mount to the Muslim Wakf. Under Israeli control, the sacred sites of all religions have been respected and preserved.

Years ago, the Latin patriarch told me that he envisioned an international administration. I reminded him that the Church of the Holy Sepulchre could not be repaired because the Christians could not agree on how to proceed. The only reason the Old City functioned was because the Israelis protected the rights of all parties. Because Israel sets the rules, all are able to share in the life of this city.

With the exception of periods of the intifadah, the unified city has been a place of safety and security for residents and tourists. The markets of the Old City have flourished. Arab children have played with mine in Gan Hapaamon and on the Haas-Sherover Promenade. Arab mothers have received medical treatment at Hadassah Hospital. Palestinian and Jew have shopped together in malls. I have been guided by Arab youth in Silwan and have offered older Arab women assistance on Derech Bet Lehem. On a functional level, on the common sense level of its inhabitants, the city has worked. A central administration has made this possible. A fragmented city would be an administrative and security nightmare.

The Psalms remind us, "What we once heard, we now have witnessed. In the city of the Eternal, in the city of our God, May God preserve it forever." But it is not only God who must preserve Jerusalem. The same psalm charges us: "Walk all about Zion. Encircle her. Count her towers. Review her ramparts. Scan her citadels. Then tell her story to later generations. Tell of our God who will guide us forever." To live up to this charge, we must be both faithful and strong. There have been efforts made by Arab leaders to deny that we have a history on the Temple Mount, to dispute the existence of the first and second Temples. We must remain faithful to our biblical memories and to our ultimate hopes. We must sustain with strength our place in the history of Jerusalem. We must be willing to make sacrifices to maintain our role in her future.

One of the great challenges of life in Israel is how to learn from our dreams, to keep them part of us and carry them forward, yet also to temper them. In our personal lives, we differentiate between our dream world and the world in which we awaken. If we fail to do so, we can endanger ourselves and those around us. Israelis have made a great effort to control their dreams as they try to create normal lives for themselves and their children. But the Palestinians have not made a serious effort to differentiate their dreams from the real world. For many of them, the fantastic still seems possible. They still imagine that they will be able to return to homes which were abandoned over 50 years ago. They still fantasize that they will control territory which – for historic, cultural, religious or security reasons – Israel will never cede. Their leaders feed this dream and make no effort to teach the masses of Palestinian Arabs to reconcile their dreams with the necessary realities of compromise.

There are those among us who have dreamt of a peaceful relationship, a shared coexistence between Israel and the Palestinian people. Some actually hoped that the peace negotiations would bring about a new Middle East. But the Palestinians have a different dream which denies our history and our place in Jerusalem and which is of a piecemeal disruption and dissolution of the State of Israel. The riots during the past six months have made it clear that their dreams have become our nightmares. Even peaceniks have had their eyes opened.

While the Palestinians are not strong enough to realize their hopes, nonetheless, Israelis will be compelled to re-imagine the form of any future relationship. Dreams – even nightmares – must be examined carefully and integrated into our waking lives. In the meantime, here in the Diaspora, we must support Israel, particularly at this difficult time. As we mark the reunification of Jerusalem in the Six Day War, may our dreams sustain us. Let us resolve as Jews have done throughout history, next year – and every year – to be in, and part of, Jerusalem.

A prayer from the Talmud (Brachot 55b) says, "Sovereign of the Universe, I am Yours and my dreams are Yours. I have dreamt a dream and do not know what it means. May it be Your will, Eternal my God and God of my ancestors, to enable all my dreams for myself and the people of Israel to be fulfilled for good ends. Strengthen and confirm my good dreams… If they require healing, heal them… Sweeten them. Turn them into a blessing… May You bring all my dreams and the dreams of the entire people of Israel to good ends. Protect me. Be gracious to us. Favour those we love with peace. Amen."

Money grabbers?

At the recent Congress plenary, it was my privilege to chair a session on Holocaust restitution issues. I am sure most of my readers will be aware that there are people out there who look askance at a survivor's desire to get back what is owed him or her – be it property or pay for slave labour, or for loss of whatever the Nazis took away.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

But the voices of those who dislike us are becoming more raucous. "Money grabbers!" they call us, as if the survivors' main objective is to get money rather than justice. Neal Sher and Elan Steinberg, our two panellists, dealt in part with this nasty problem. They dealt with the right that survivors have to obtain what is due to them, which is both material and moral restitution, the latter being a way to get history right so that all of us have an honourable future.

Steinberg made one memorable point: If the Nazis had only taken away our jobs, our possessions or anything material, no one would ever question our desire to get back what we have lost. But the fact they also murdered us seems to have obscured this right, and suddenly the whole picture is distorted.

The bottom line is that, though we may not be able to silence our critics, we will continue to ask for what is owed us. The real question is, why did we wait so long to ask for it?

Our panellists suggested that the answer lies largely in the availability of heretofore classified documents. Not until the United States opened its archives did we begin to find out what had been stashed away, and not until the Swiss made themselves subject to public enquiry did their banks begin to comply with the legitimate needs of the survivors.

In addition, our speakers averred that the movie Schindler's List and the opening of the Holocaust Museum in Washington and the publicity that attended it are also largely responsible for stimulating survivors to look at the opportunities for recovering what is owed to them.

The panellists discharged their obligation with clarity and aplomb, and the large audience was appreciative. Their questions were answered promptly and forthrightly. They made reference to the unhappy fact that the number of survivors decreases rapidly year by year, and that the time will not be far off when no one will be alive to claim what is his or her due.

But that will leave our community with a special responsibility, not because the heirs or the communities will want the money, but because justice has to be done. Restitution is something that is owed for moral as well as material reasons; history demands it and whatever our enemies will say about it should not in any fashion deter us from pursuing what is right. For if not now, when?

Maybe all you need is love

The Vancouver Jewish Film Festival has brought a wide selection of films on Jewish subjects to our fair city for 13 years. (Mazel tov on your bar mitzvah!) This year was no exception.

Two in particular struck a deep chord: a Polish film of Solomon (Shloime) Ansky's The Dybbuk, and a German-language story based on true characters Aimee and Jaguar.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Both were love stories. Both ended tragically. Both spoke about the redeeming power of love, albeit in very different ways. And, if readers recall last month's column regarding Ruth Wisse's book The Modern Jewish Canon, both were made in languages that she accused of being inherently anti-Semitic and death-dealing to those who chose them.

Ansky wrote The Dybbuk in 1916 in Yiddish, and later turned his story about demonic possession into a play. The film version I saw was performed in Polish with a magnificent cast of actors. Indeed, we asked ourselves sitting in the darkened theatre, where did they get so many Jewish-looking actors?

The story hinges on the love of a young couple whose parents had agreed that their children should marry. The girl's father, however, ignores (or forgets) his original promise and although the two children grow up to be soulmates, the girl is promised to another man. Broken-hearted, her true love dies and his embittered soul comes back and possesses the girl's body. Her father takes her to a wonder-working rebbe to have the threatening spirit exorcised.

The exorcism is a powerful scene, and ultimately, it is a futile gesture because the girl dies as the boy's soul leaves her. The false groom her father chose does not arrive in time for the wedding ceremony.

"Too late," the rebbe sighs, "too late." We are left only with the implication that after death, the true lovers will be reunited in the world of spirits.

We all know what happened to the Jews of Poland two centuries after the story is supposed to have taken place. So why make a film in Polish about Jews, after their community has been destroyed? Is it too late?

The story is about broken promises and the deadly results of treachery. Yet the performance itself is a testimony to memory, and just maybe, the tentative beginnings of a people's ability to explore its past – in this case, the Polish people and the Polish past, a past inhabited by ghosts of a vital and thriving community, now dead at the hands of their neighbours.

Aimee and Jaguar fall in love in a place far away from the shtetl. It is Berlin in 1944 and Allied planes are bombing it to rubble. The Nazis are still rounding up and killing Jews. The story is true: a Jewish lesbian and the wife of a Nazi soldier fall in love.

The Jewish girl and her friends hide in plain sight in the clubs and bars of a decaying Reich. She herself is hiding her family and helping others to escape. But rather than leave, she remains with her lover. Ultimately she is found out and dies in Theresienstadt. Today her former lover, now 85, lives in Berlin, and still mourns "Jaguar."

The language is German, the love story lesbian, the impact – incredible. The women walk through the bombed city immune to the fires and destruction. In fact no one seems to notice that the Germans are losing the war. In the midst of it all, they have carved out a quiet place where they can love, while all around them is hatred.

So why was this film made?

First of all, it is a true story. Second, Germany and the Jews continue to struggle to find their way back to each other, like Aimee and Jaguar seeing each other across a chasm of death.

The country that once seemed poised to give its Jewish citizens true equality instead looked into the dark corners of its soul and destroyed them. How to get back?

Unlike Poland, Germany has Jews returning to its cities. True, most are Russian Jews rather than those of German-Jewish descent. But perhaps that is how reconciliation begins. Maybe there is a place where the chasm can be bridged. And why not use love to build it? We've tried hate.

A personal reflection on joy, sadness

Jewish life – communal and personal – is punctuated by times of great joy and periods of immense sadness. We celebrate the exodus from Egypt (Pesach) and the giving of the Torah (Shavuot); shortly thereafter, we mourn the destruction of the Temple (Tisha b'Av). We sing Hatikvah proudly on Israel Independence Day (Yom Ha'atzmaut); yet we chant the El Malei Rachamim fervently on Yom Hashoah. We celebrate weddings, births and bar and bat mitzvahs, yet with almost equal effort, we mourn the death of a loved one or observe the yahrzeit of a family member.

Bruce Elman in Windsor

Joy and sadness, sadness and joy – in our tradition, these two emotions are often interwoven. Each of the three joyous pilgrimage festivals – Sukkot, Pesach, and Shavuot – sets aside one day on which to recite the Yizkor service for the departed. Yom Hazikaron – the day on which we remember those who have given their lives for the State of Israel – directly precedes Yom Ha'atzmaut. Effectively, the observance of these two occasions blends into one long moment of happiness and sorrow.

This Jewish tradition is also found, of course, in the breaking of the glass by the groom at the conclusion of the wedding ceremony. The glass is broken to symbolize that, even at a time of such supreme joy, we remember the times of suffering of the Jewish people. For the same reason, at bar and bat mitzvahs in my shul in Edmonton, we often do a reading about martyrdom in the Warsaw Ghetto or recite a prayer for all the unfortunate children in the world today.

I will always remember this year's 1st of June as a day of great joy and immense sadness. On this day, my daughter Gail's one year term as n'siah (president) of the North West Canada Region of B'nai B'rith Girls came to an end. To mark the conclusion of her term, Gail, as is the tradition of the organization, delivered a "State of the Region" address to the girls from Saskatchewan and Alberta who attended spring convention at Camp BB-Riback outside of Red Deer. The parents of the n'siah are invited (or, as in our case, commanded) to attend.

Originally, I thought that Gail would deliver a 10 – 15 minute speech and we would be out of there in no time. This was not the case, however. With great force and presence, Gail delivered a 45 minute speech that was objective yet visionary, personal yet institutional, humorous yet serious. She even said lovely things about her brothers and her parents.

But there was another part to the evening: an elaborate (and quite meaningful) ceremony (about which we were sworn to secrecy) – complete with video and slide show – during which the young women of BBG paid tribute to their outgoing president. (The adult community could learn something from these youngsters!)

When it came time for the parents to speak, I had great difficulty controlling my emotions. Although this event did not match the euphoria of Gail's birth 18 years ago, I nevertheless felt great happiness and nachas from knowing that she had become such an accomplished and mature young woman. I also felt some comfort in the knowledge that these young women of BBG were destined to be the Jewish leaders of the future.

As you well know, however, June 1st was also a day of unspeakable sorrow. Twenty young people, just like Gail, had their lives cut short by a fanatical Islamic extremist who, caring nothing for human life – either his own or others' – blew himself up in front of a nightclub on the beach in Tel Aviv. Dozens more were maimed and injured, their lives undeniably altered by a terrorist's act of cowardice.

We lived in Jerusalem during the year of the bus bombings. It was difficult, but I never felt the sense of outrage and despair I experienced on June 1st while watching the television reports. It seems to me that Israel is no longer involved in a peace process; there is apparently no partner for peace. Rather, Israel is involved in a war – a war in which the enemy plays by none of the accepted rules of warfare and where soldiers and citizens are indistinguishable, a war which will apparently be fought not at the borders of the State but in the heart of its cities.

One must feel immense sorrow, not just at what occurred on June 1st, but also at what lies ahead.

American Jews in the Southern states

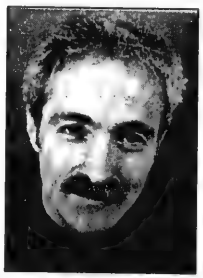
During the Jim Crow era, when segregation was the disgraceful norm in the American South, this region typified everything socially and politically retrogressive about the United States. One wonders how Jews, history's perennial scapegoat, could have lived in, much less accommodated themselves to, such a mean, backward, humiliating system.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

I was mindful of these currents as I read The Peddler's Son: Growing up Jewish in Mississippi by Edward Cohen, The Jewish Confederates by Robert Rosen, and volume two of Southern Jewish History, an academic journal from Georgia.

The Peddler's Son (University Press of Mississippi) is a perceptive, elegantly-written memoir of a second-generation Southern Jew coming to terms with his dual identity.

Formerly head writer of Mississippi Educational Television, Cohen was born in Jackson – a town "utterly segregated" by race – in 1948.



Edward Cohen

Cohen's paternal grandfather, a Romanian Jew, settled in Mississippi in the late 19th century. He and his brother operated a clothing store near Jackson frequented mainly by African Americans.

"Until I was six," he confesses, "I lived sheltered from [the] South in an almost entirely Jewish universe." As the only Jew in his classroom, he quickly realized that he was seen as an outsider. "The farther I ventured into adolescence, the more isolated I felt from my peers."

Ambivalence was his lot. "I didn't want to be a Christian... but at the same time... I didn't want to be different."

This attitude suffused the local Jewish community. "Our pasteurized, homogenized Judaism, with as much exoticism as possible pared away, was thoroughly attuned to the unvoiced desires of Southern Jews to fit in."

In line with this imperative, Cohen and some of his contemporaries took an assimilationist route. He married non-Jewish women, and regarded kashruth as a bizarre, antiquated practice. And yet, he acknowledges, there was still a distance between Jews and non-Jews in Jackson. "... we remained unbreachably separate," he observes, adding that anti-Semitism was not really much of a problem.

As caucasians, Jews were privileged. "We wern't Christian, but that wasn't determinative. All that mattered was that we weren't black."

In order to get along, Jews accepted segregation as a given, but were probably "more liberal" than their Christian counterparts.

As he puts it: "We didn't say 'nigger,' unless by much-regretted accident. We didn't require, or expect, Blacks to step aside on the sidewalk. We said hello to Blacks on the street." And in Jackson, Cohen Brothers was the only white-owned business with an integrated rest room and water fountain.

During the civil rights struggle, Cohen was torn by conflicting feelings: He was deeply ashamed of Mississippi's race-mired image. But when he read "pious articles" in the Northern press condemning Mississippi, he recoiled in horror.

Cohen left Jackson to attend college in Florida, but returned after graduation. Today, he resides in California. Mississippi, though, has had a marked influence on him. "... I'm hard put to say where the Southern leaves off and the Jewish begins."

***

Having read Cohen's memoir, I was curious to dip into Robert Rosen's The Jewish Confederates, an intriguing work published by the University of South Carolina Press.

A third-generation Southerner born and reared in Charleston, South Carolina, Rosen deals with the American Civil War through the prism of the South's Jewish community. Although not a professional historian, he is a keen researcher, a competent writer and, one might add, a member of the South Carolina Historical Society.

Amply illustrated with photographs and maps, The Jewish Confederates focuses on the Jewish soldiers and civilians who served the doomed Confederacy from 1861 to 1865. In passing, the book glosses over the history of Jews in Dixie.

The first known Jew to reach the South was Elias Legardo, who arrived in Virgina in 1621. The first confirmed documentation of a Jew living in the Carolinas was in 1695. By 1820, Charleston, home to 700 Jews, was the foremost Jewish community in the United States.

Southern Jews, Rosen suggests, accepted slavery as part of everyday life and embraced the antebellum South's notions of race and states' rights.

Judah Philip Benjamin

Probably the most prominent Jew in the Confederacy was Judah Philip Benjamin, a Sephardi raised in the South. He was the first attorney-general, the second secretary of war and the third secretary of state of the Confederate States of America.

Two of the highest ranking officers in the Confederacy were Col. Leon Dawson Marks and Col. Abraham Charles Myers.

Marks, a Shreveport lawyer, was wounded during the 1863 Union siege of Vicksburg, Mississippi, and died shortly afterward. Myers, a West Point graduate, was the quartermaster general of the Confederacy. He was responsible for supplying the army with clothing, supplies and transportation. Fort Myers, Florida, is named after him.

Colonel Abraham Myers

The Jewish Confederates, with more than 60 pages of footnotes, is a valuable addition to American Jewish historiography.

***

Southern Jewish History, edited by Mark Bauman and Rachel Heimovics, is published by the Southern Jewish Historical Society.

The first essay to pique my attention was "Jewish Merchants and Black Customers in the Age of Jim Crow" by Clive Webb.

According to Webb, Jews were a significant economic force in the South, and by the 20th century, Jewish department stores could be found in almost every major Southern city.

Since they were dependent on white customers, the Jewish owners of such stores were bound by local laws and customs. Water fountains, restrooms and restaurants were rigidly segregated, and partly as a result of these loathsome practices, the relationship between Jewish merchants and blacks was ambiguous, to say the least.

The proprietors of small stores, though, were in a better position to treat black customers equally, he notes.

In another essay, Marci Cohen Ferris traces the development of Southern Jewish cuisine. Early Jewish settlers were faced by the challenge of respecting Jewish dietary laws in a place where the consumption of pork, bacon, ham, lard and chitterlings was extremely common. German Jews adjusted their palates accordingly, but Eastern European Jews clung to traditional foods.

More often than not, she discloses, Jewish women relied on black maids to "cook Jewish" on the Sabbath and holidays.

Deborah Weiner, in a weak piece titled "The Jews of Keystone," describes a small Jewish community in the coalfields of West Virginia. Stacy Harris, in a similarly unsatisfactory essay, draws a pen portrait of the participation of Jews in Nashville's country music scene. Her conclusion? Jews have been actively involved in the business, but have had to cope with racial stereotyping and downright anti-Semitism.

Sounds familiar.

Gender & G-D

THE UNION OF PROPHETIC VISION AND FEMININE IMAGERY

A public lecture with Dr. Esther Skhop

A philosophical and psychological tapestry is woven by one of the leading teachers of Tanakh in the world today. Dr. Esther Skhop's critical textual analysis of the book of Jeremiah brings new insights to understanding the spiritual avenues of G-d's interacting with the world, and reveals that the so-called 'gender gap' might not be so wide.

Dr. Esther Skhop is presently Dean of the Anne M. Blitstein Teachers Institute of Hebrew Theological College of Chicago. She is a dynamic speaker and published author on topics related to Biblical study and Women in the Tanakh.

A riveting journey

Walking The Bible, A Journey By Land Through The Five Books of Moses,* by Bruce Feiler, HarperCollins Publishers.

Books
Bernard Baskin

This book is armchair travel with a spiritual bent. When Bruce Feiler visited Israel he was struck "like a bolt of Cecil B. Demille lightning," by the idea that in and around the land he was enjoying were the actual places visited by biblical personalities. How better to understand the book that connected him to his ancestors than to stand, in person, on those very sites?

The author confesses that, "It had never occurred to me that the biblical story was so concrete, so connected to the ground. To here. To now."

Enlisting the aid of renowned Israeli archaeologist Avner Goren, the pair retraced chronologically the Five Books of Moses, travelling 10,000 miles, with stops in Turkey, Israel, Egypt, the Sinai, the Palestinian territories and Jordan.

They saw the mountain where Noah's Ark was thought to have landed, climbed Mount Sinai, visited the site of the burning bush and many other places referred to in the text, based on the latest archaeological research.

Most of the trip took place in 1998 during a "bubble of peace." Many of the holy places would be difficult to examine today in the midst of strife.

At each sacred spot, Feiler and Goren whip out their Bibles to explore both its history and geography and debate its authenticity.

Most often their conclusions are uncertain. But does it really matter? The author writes, "When I first came up with the idea of retracing the Bible, I was fascinated by questions of archaeology and identification: the precise place where Abraham went to sacrifice Isaac; the specific valley where Jacob had his dream; the exact mountain where Moses met God.

"Now, more than a year later, I was shifting my objectives. I still found these questions fascinating, but more in an academic, recreational sort of way. Instead, the questions that were drawing me more were those of symbolism, character and metaphor. I was reading the text less as a Baedeker now, and more as a Bible. I was reading it for meaning."

On lake Timsah in Egypt – perhaps the Red Sea area mentioned in the Bible – the authors, in a boat about the size of a bathtub, made out of eucalyptus, together with four other anxious passengers, are rowed by a 16-year-old to the opposite shore. Understandably, the author imagines the ancient Israelites miraculously walking through the parted waters in their flight for freedom.

On foot, jeep, rowboat or camel, the tireless author – his curiosity prodigious, his intellect sharp, his legs willing and able to climb – makes his way through three continents, five countries and four war zones.

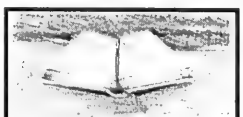
Along the way he interviews a variety of persons on what the Bible means to them.

"And everybody had an answer. Every single person had a way to relate to the story, whether it was a Kurdish freedom fighter in Dogubayazit, a Jewish settler on the West Bank, a Muslim archaeologist in Cairo, a Bedouin shepherd in the Sinai, a Palestinian ambassador in Amman. In all of our travels, I never entered a room in which someone didn't have a story, a theory, or a question about the text."

One part adventure story, one part archaeological detective work and one part spiritual exploration, Walking The Bible is a riveting journey into ancient lands where long ago formidable personalities fashioned a monumental book.

What's in a name?

By RABBI RONALD WEISS



Rabbinic Reflections

Names are among our most personal characteristics. They identify us to others and serve to distinguish who we are from everyone else. In Judaism, however, a name is not merely a term of reference by which a person is known. In our tradition, a name also defines the essence of an individual.

In Parshat Shelach we hear of how a name is bestowed upon an individual in a most unusual fashion. Before sending the Meraglim on their mission to scout the land, we are told that Moshe changes the name of Hoshea bin Nun to Yehoshua (Numbers 13:16). Our Sages, of blessed memory, offer many explanations for this change. Yet rabbinic thought is clearly of one mind in stating that it was meant to protect Yehoshua from the spies' plan.

One of the most intriguing comments in this discussion is the statement that the yud which was added to Yehoshua's name was the same yud that was removed from Sarah's name when it was changed from Sarai to Sarah.

The obvious question here is, why do our Sages speak of Sarah in this context? What was it about her that could afford Yehoshua protection and safety even in the midst of a most hostile environment?

Rav Nissan Alpert, of blessed memory, responds to these questions. In Limudai Nissan, he begins his discussion by noting another difficulty in the text. When Moshe dispatched the Meraglim, he gave them many directions. He told them to make a military assessment of the people and the cities in which the inhabitants dwelled. This, after all, was their primary task – to scout the land, ostensibly to facilitate the conquest in which they would soon be engaged. But Moshe also gave the Meraglim another instruction. He told them to appraise the land itself – to examine it carefully and report back on its qualities – whether it was good for agriculture, whether it itself was inherently good.

Rav Alpert observes that, in general, when spies are sent out on a mission, they are expected to complete a military report. Therefore, to request a description of the people and the fortifications of their cities was perfectly appropriate. However, he asks, what was the purpose of requiring the Meraglim to pay attention to the quality of the land? How did a description of the land's indigenous fruit further the goal at hand (which was to enter the land and take possession of it as the Almighty had promised)?

Rav Alpert states that Moshe was not sending them on this mission for the single purpose of determining the strength of the defences throughout the land. The spies were not to function as spies exclusively. There was a dual purpose to their mission. First they were to assess the military readiness of the inhabitants. But Moshe was also eager to hear what the Meraglim would say when they saw their new land. Thus, he instructed them to look at the land – their land – and see how good it was. Moshe was trying to instill a sense of pride and wonder in these princes of Israel, so that they should be overwhelmed at God's graciousness to the Jewish people in giving them such good land.

But what is the connection to Sarah, and why did Moshe change Hoshea's name to Yehoshua using the "yud" that had been removed from her name? With this background, Rav Alpert explains that of all the patriarchs and matriarchs of our people, Sarah was the one who had the most strength to zealously guard Jewish inheritance and its attachment to the land. Sarah was the one who, when faced with a threat to her son's inheritance, told her husband to send Hagar and Yishmael away. Sarah says clearly that Yishmael will not inherit with Yitzchak (Genesis 21:10). Thus, at her insistence, Hagar and Yishmael are banished.

This was the lesson Moshe wanted Yehoshua to learn so that he would be saved from the plans of the Meraglim. He would have to be strong in his love and devotion to the land in order to survive the Meraglim's onslaught. Moshe took the "yud" from Sarah's earlier name and gave it to Yehoshua to teach him that when one enters the land, one must have Sarah's attitude.

Jewish singles & the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It's the largest Jewish Singles Club in the world. Actually, it's dozens of clubs. And for Jewish singles, the Internet can be an excellent way to look for a date, a partner or a lifelong partner.

Today, I begin my look at Jewish dating resources on the Internet.

But first a warning. Since there are so many services out there, it is impossible to rate them or vouch for their effectiveness. Mention in this column should not be seen as an endorsement. As with anything else on the Internet, do not give out your name or other personal identification until you have thoroughly checked out a service.

Let the dater beware.

A good place to start is with the article Maximizing Dot-Com Dating [aish.com/dating/wisdom/Maximizing_Dot-Com_Dating.asp] by Rosie Einhorn and Sherry Zimmerman. Their first piece of advice: Use the Internet as a tool for introduction rather than as a medium for conducting an extended online relationship. "Otherwise, you may begin to build an emotionally intimate friendship with someone whose printed words are charming – only to later discover that his/her personality, character or appearance are not what you bargained for." Be careful how much personal information you reveal and don't hesitate to ask for references. And when you do meet in person, keep your contact short and don't feel pressured simply because you've spent so much time, effort and money.

Aish HaTorah devotes a huge Web site to dating advice [aish.com/dating/]. There are more than 100 articles dealing with everything from Jekyll and Hyde Relationships to How to Survive Getting Dumped to Forging the Relationship Bond. The article titled 14 Things to Talk about on a Date has some suggestions for people who want to try something other than "Do you like Woody Allen?" Here are some of their suggestions for ice-breakers:

- What has been the most satisfying achievement of your life?
- Tell me about your family? How would you have changed the way you were raised?
- Is there something you've dreamed of doing for a long time? Why haven't you done it?

A great feature is that each article is accompanied by a discussion where others can comment on the advice and share your perspective.

Since so much of Judaism is centred on the family, that can put added pressure on singles. The Union of American Hebrew Congregations understands that and has put together a list of "18 Little Things You Can Do to Welcome our Singles" [uahc.org/family/U18Singl.htm]. Some suggestions:

- Honour a single friend by asking her/him to be the kvatterin/kvatter at your child's brit or baby-naming.
- Encourage recently single congregants to feel that they still have a place in your "couples" chavurah.
- Imagine being a single who booked a cruise on Noah's ark.

When all is said and done, one of the classic ways to advertise for love is to take out a classified ad. Although he's not on the market, Rabbi Bob Alper is always on the lookout for someone who would be the perfect match for one of his friends. So he has gathered some of his favourite ads in (the always interesting) JewishWorldReview [www.jewishworldreview.com/bob/alper1.asp]. In one, a "physically active, world-travelled semi-retired physician" was looking for an "attractive, natural, unburdened, minimal shopper." Here's one from the Forward: "Striking, sophisticated, slender redhead, former model from the midwest. Looking to meet charming, intelligent, fun loving, self-sufficient gentleman, 50-65, for mature relationship. Must have positive cash flow, a substantial amount of stocks and bonds, and have a terminal disease with no known heirs." And this appeared in Boston's alternative paper, the Phoenix: "Single Jewish woman seeks single Jewish man with dead mother."

So do these ads kindle a flame in you? These personal ads have apparently appeared in Israeli and Jewish papers [www.mazornet.com/jewishcl/dating.htm].

- Couch potato latke, in search of the right applesauce. Let's try it for eight days. Who knows?
- Yeshiva bochur, Torah scholar, long beard, payos. Seeks same in woman.
- Desperately seeking shmoozing! Retired senior citizen desires female companion 70 for kvetching, kvelling, and krechtzing.
- Shul gabbai, 36. I take out the Torah Saturday morning. Would like to take you out Saturday night.

Caravan's Jerusalem pavilion is back in business

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's back! The Jerusalem pavilion at Caravan, Toronto's annual multicultural festival, will be open this year, as in many past years, at the Bloor JCC.

Last year there was no Jerusalem pavilion because planned renovations at the longtime Bloor Street and Spadina Avenue site meant the building would not be available, said Arieh Rosenblum, Ontario regional director of B'nai Brith Canada and co-ordinator of the pavilion.

Although he noted that Caravan is a non-political venue, people who are looking to reflect solidarity with Israel or Jerusalem may be interested in attending the pavilion, Rosenblum said.

Staples of previous years' pavilions that will be familiar to former visitors include the selection of kosher Israeli foods, and the Jerusalem Singers and Dancers, whose show will reflect the multicultural nature of Jerusalem as an important city for three faiths, said Rosenblum.

360-degree projected views of the city

What is new this year is the use of technology to "try and bring Jerusalem right into the pavilion" with live shots of the Western Wall plaza via the Internet and with 360-degree projected views of the city.

Visitors will also be able to access Web sites offering news from Israel, such as the Jerusalem Post online.

"The goal, as always, is to project the positive and encouraging image of Jerusalem," said Rosenblum. "We hope everyone can come and have a good time, and learn something about Israel and Jerusalem in a positive way."

The pavilion, staffed and organized by almost 100 volunteers, will be open Sunday, June 17, from 3 p.m. to 10:30 p.m. (last show is at 9 p.m.), and through Thursday, June 21 from 6 p.m. to 10:30 p.m. David Grader will serve as pavilion mayor, Michelle Hart as pavilion princess.

Funding religious schools is an act of tolerance

BY ED MORGAN

Guest Voice

Several extraordinary weeks have now gone by since the minister of finance read his budget speech in the Ontario legislature. The budget contained a measure of financial relief in the form of tax credits for families who send their children to private schools, including those denominational schools whose adherents were not yet in Canada in sufficient numbers in 1867 to benefit from the constitution's protection of the education rights of religious minorities.

During that time, Ontarians have been assured that religious education will lead to intolerance of secular lifestyles, and this by a Citytv talk-show host who openly calls Orthodox religious practices of any kind a distinct form of evil. Apparently he forgot that religious tolerance might be a two-way street.

Further, a representative of a public school teachers' union referred to religious schools as "segregationist" on a recently televised debate. Apparently he forgot that in 1999 it was the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation that defended the freedom of speech of one of this province's more notorious white supremacist teachers who had been fired by the Board of Education in Peel Region for his neo-Nazi affiliations.

Public school trustees in Toronto have suggested that they no longer will lease unused school buildings to private schools, which presumably would include those several Jewish day schools that pay hundreds of thousands of dollars in rent to the public school system. Apparently in their moment of spite, the trustees forgot their constant cries of underfunding, not to mention their own rhetoric about the public school system being the province's sole bastion of open-mindedness and pluralism.

Religious communities have been lectured by politicians and others who in good faith support a strong public school system, on the fundamentally private nature of religious educational choices. Apparently they forgot that they send their own children to publicly funded Roman Catholic separate schools.

If the much-bandied value of tolerance means anything in our society, it means that each religious group in Ontario must have the benefit of equal respect and equal support. Just as public school advocates correctly state that it is in the classroom and schoolyard that the social ethic of a tolerant society is played out, religious school advocates know that it is in the education of children that valued cultural knowledge and traditions are passed down.

There is room in Ontario for both the public school and the religious school visions of education. Indeed, we have 150 years of experience with Roman Catholic schools turning out well-educated citizens that are every bit as valued and productive as their public school counterparts.

This is certainly one way to read the constitutional pact of 1867. When Quebec promised that it would publicly support Protestant schools and Ontario reciprocated with a promise to support Roman Catholic schools, the fathers of confederation (and there were only fathers in the legislature at the time) put into place a nascent form of Canadian multiculturalism. Now that we have had the wisdom to expand our political representatives to include mothers, we can also afford to expand our embrace of other, more newly arrived faiths.

Publicly supported religious schools have the potential to vastly enrich the province's cultural landscape. We are blessed in Ontario with a well-functioning multicultural society, and the existing religious schools – whether publicly run by the separate school boards or privately run by other religious denominations – reflect the society around them in their adherence to the ethic of tolerance. We would expect and demand nothing less.

Critics have asserted that it is only in the mixing of communities in the public school environment that continued social tolerance can be learned. Ontario's public schools no doubt produce a socially benevolent educational message, but it is not simply because they are public schools. It is because they reflect an already cosmopolitan and tolerant society.

If it were otherwise, we would all have to admire the educational system in the United States, where there are no Catholic separate schools and no public support for any denominational education. But America's urban public schools are not exactly a model of social tolerance; sadly, they reflect a dysfunctional society. Haven't our pundits ever heard Woody Allen's line about winning two weeks at New York City's inter-faith camp, where he was sadistically beaten by boys of all creeds?

The essence of Talmudic learning centres on an ongoing debate between two opposing schools of thought, one associated with Rabbi Hillel and the other with Rabbi Shamai. The discourse is on a multitude of subjects, from theology to ethics to ritual. For each topic, Shamai expresses his often-cogent point of view, while Hillel consistently presents his own perspective which also takes Shamai into account.

Our teachers have taught us to prefer Hillel over Shamai. His arguments may not be better in every case, but his approach is one of openness and respect for the other point of view. Speaking for Ontario's Jewish day schools, it is in this spirit that we embrace the current proposals for public support. We would ask everyone who advocates for an improved educational environment in this province to do the same.

School funding debate continues

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — While some groups oppose publicly financed support of private schools, others argue that the proposed provincial tax rebate is simply an extension of Canada's long-standing commitment towards multiculturalism.

Consisting of approximately 50 families, Oraynu, a Congregation for Humanistic Judaism, is based on a secular approach towards the cultural, creative and spiritual aspects of Jewish history and heritage.

In a press release, Oraynu stated that they are "opposed to the financial support of private schools, including the Catholic Separate School system, by direct or indirect government funding."

Yet Michael Brown, director of York University's Centre for Jewish Studies, argued that Catholics have been financially supported for well over a century in Canada.

Historically, Brown said, there has always been federal and provincial encouragement to develop, fortify and strengthen ethnic identities.

Before the implementation of the Multiculturalism Act in 1971, Brown said, Canada was officially a binational country and gave support to two languages, two religions and two regions.

"We gave each other a large measure of respect, even when we collided."

After 1971, "there has been an official undertaking in our country away from two groups to a federation of groups with the understanding that Canada would be stronger as their ethnic groups strengthened."

According to Oraynu, "The proposed Ontario government tax rebate for students... would divert public funds [taxes not collected] to private educational institutions."

Some groups argue that this would weaken the public school system.

However, Brown notes that "in all the other provinces which fund day schools, there has been no indication that their public schools are any worse than those in Ontario."

In the rest of Canada, Brown said, with regard to education, Catholic schools are generally supported and the commitment to multiculturalism is strong, real and a "very Canadian kind of thing."

However, Brown said, "the current debate around the rebate being offered by the government in Ontario shows that the dedication towards multiculturalism here may not be one that everyone shares – at least so far as it would require that the government put up some money for independent schools."

Pebble's is back at Wonderland

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – For the third year, Paramount Canada's Wonderland has kosher food, thanks to Len Libman.

Kosher Pebble's Hot Dogs, a permanent site in Hanna-Barbera Land, located beside the entrance to Bedrock Aquarium, has hot dogs, veggie dogs, french fries and a variety of drinks.

Libman, of Libman Food Services, which owns and operates the kosher facility, told The CJN that last year, Pebble's "beat all our expectations, and we expect to do the same this year."

He estimates that more than 25,000 people came to Pebble's last season. "Last year we even had camp groups and others from across the country and from the United States.

"We are constantly upgrading," says Libman. "We now have a new barbecue grill, [so] we can continue to accommodate shul events and other large groups."

Arrangements for these events must be made in advance.

Although Pebble's has to operate under a price schedule set at Wonderland, Libman says, "I believe that our French fries are the lowest price in the park."

While he says he is "pleased to provide a service to the [Jewish] community," he notes that many non-Jews patronize Pebble's because they say they like the products.

As well, vegetarians, those with dietary restrictions, and members of religious groups purchase food from Pebble's.

Libman, who is a partner in Pre-Lock Security Services Inc., got into the food business in 1998. When he visited Wonderland with his family, they could not find any kosher food. When his wife complained to the administration, the staff member asked if she knew anyone who would operate a kosher business. Her husband decided that he would do it.

Libman says he hopes Wonderland "will let us add some new menu items in the future."

It is open Sunday through Thursday, 11 a.m. to 8 p.m., Friday 11 a.m. to 6 p.m. and is closed on Saturday.

Torah donated for youth minyan

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sidney and Pearl Woolf, longtime supporters of the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) are donating a sefer Torah to be used at the NCSY youth minyan at Beth Avraham Yoseph synagogue (BAYT) in Thornhill.

The sefer Torah is being donated in memory of their parents Yitzchak Tzvi and Tova Feiga Cannon and Yitzchak Gershon and Chaya Woolf, and in memory of their machuten Rabbi Moshe Refoel Kaplan, a longtime teacher.

It will be dedicated on June 17. A procession from the corner of Hilda and Clarke avenues will form at 11 a.m., arriving at BAYT for a ceremony at 11:45.

While it is traditional for those dedicating a sefer Torah to give the community the opportunity to share the mitzvah by dedicating a letter or verse, the Woolfs wanted to encourage youngsters to participate as well. They have therefore started a Toonie for Torah campaign, which allows young people who send in $2 to dedicate a letter.

"Everyone who sends in a toonie will get a certificate and a chance to win a CD player; they will be put on the NCSY mailing list and get a fact sheet called Secrets of Torah," said NCSY regional director Rabbi Glenn Black.

NCSY events co-ordinator Barbara Meyer told The CJN that response has been excellent. "There is a lot of interest, and donations are coming in every day," she said.

Monies raised through the Toonies for Torah campaign will be channelled into the Teaching Kids to Care Fund, a new fund established by NCSY in honour of the Woolfs. It will be used to support and expand the organization's scholarship and outreach programs.

Sidney and Pearl Woolf have been active in the Toronto Jewish community since they arrived here from England in 1950. A number of their family members have been active in NCSY, including David Woolf, currently president of the board of directors; Mordie Shields (a grandson-in-law) is on the board; and granddaughter-in-law Guila Woolf is an employee of the organization, doing outreach and serving as director of Camp NCSY Guila, an overnight camp program for teenage girls.

NCSY is the youth education and outreach arm of the Union of Orthodox Hebrew Congregations. In Toronto, its programs include Torah High, an afternoon Hebrew school for high school students; NCSUS, a new program for university students; the Drop-In Zone, a drop-in centre for high school students at the organization's headquarters at the Main Exchange Plaza at Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue; and Jewish Culture Club, which meets at various high schools around the GTA. It also sponsors tours to Israel.

For more information, call NCSY at 905-761-6279, e-mail ncsy@ncsy.ca, or go to its Web site, www.ncsy.ca.

Kids for Israel Bazaar, Carnival set

TORONTO — The Kids for Israel Bazaar and Carnival, to be held June 17, from 2 to 5 p.m. at Westmount Collegiate in Thornhill, will be a great chance for kids to participate in a number of activities, including arts and crafts, face-painting and sports.

At the same time, according to Gail Michalowicz of Aish Hatorah, which is sponsoring the program, they will have a chance to feel connected to the children of Israel.

Aish Hatorah wants to convey the message that "we [Jews in Canada and those in Israel] are linked – we are all one family," Michalowicz, director of special programming and one of the event's organizers, said.

The bazaar, she said, aims to show the fun connected with Israel, but also the reality, that "children there can't just go to the mall – they have to keep looking over their shoulders."

Proceeds from the event are going to the Israel Emergency Fund. The event will include a raffle, the sale of coffee, the sale of Israeli flags and a clothing sale, Michalowicz said.

Youngsters can make their own tzedakah boxes and can create notes that will go on a "kotel wall" and will later be taken to Israel and put into the Western Wall. They can also dip their hands in paint and put their handprints on a "solidarity mural" called Join Hands for Israel that will be sent to an Israeli daycare centre.

Another special activity the children can take part in is the Rosh Hashanah Card Program, Michalowicz said. Part of a project by the Jewish Dream Network, children who are 21 and younger in schools, camps and participating in programs around the world will send a card to children in Israel that says, "You aren't alone. We are with you and wish you a happy and safe New Year."

The cards will be collected and mounted on huge pieces of cardboard and shipped to Israel. After being displayed in Jerusalem, the display will be broken up and sent to different areas around the country.

Everyone attending will be given a loot bag that will include two Shabbat candles.

A charity drive will collect new or gently used children's clothing and toys.

Race relations committee member under fire

Distributed controversial material at a workshop on teaching the Holocaust

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress wants further action to be taken against a volunteer member of York Region's Race Relations Advisory Committee for distributing controversial material at a workshop on teaching the Holocaust.

Congress has written to the York Region District School Board, which oversees the committee, saying further action is "required" against Bader Abu-Zahra.

Last month, Abu-Zahra survived a vote on whether to remove him from the race relations committee. The vote, which was not recorded, was close, and there were several abstentions, according to committee co-ordinator Jose Fernandes.

Congress refused to provide The CJN with a copy of its letter to the school board. Len Rudner, CJC Ontario region's community relations director (and also a volunteer member of the York Region Race Relations Committee) said the letter claimed the committee "made the wrong decision" in voting to retain Abu-Zahra, and that more investigation is needed. Rudner would not say whether CJC is seeking Abu-Zahra's removal.

The matter goes back to April, during a board-sponsored professional development program for teachers on anti-racism. At a workshop on teaching the Holocaust, Abu-Zahra distributed a review of The Holocaust Industry: Reflections on the Exploitation of Jewish Suffering by the notorious U.S. writer Norman Finkelstein, known for his belief that the Holocaust is used by Jewish organizations to extort political power and financial gain, and as an ideological weapon to further Zionist objectives.

In an April 23 letter to Abu-Zahra, Alan Shefman, chair of the Race Relations Advisory Committee, called the review of Finkelstein's book "anti-Semitic and therefore contrary to the ethos of the board of education and especially of this committee."

Shefman said that a member of the race relations committee distributing "hateful and disrespectful" material is "totally unacceptable," and he asked for Abu-Zahra's "immediate resignation."

Abu-Zahra responded by saying that "special focus" on the Holocaust is "exclusive and marginalizes the suffering of other people... the belief that there is a hierarchy of human suffering is in itself profoundly racist and deeply offensive."

He pointed to other examples of 20th century genocide.

"In trying to silence me," Abu-Zahra wrote Shefman, "you have only confirmed Prof. Finkelstein's point that politically powerful interests have exploited the suffering of Jews during the Second World War and that the spectre of anti-Semitism to silence opinions with which they disagree. Next, will you accuse Professor Finkelstein, the devoted son of Holocaust survivors, of being anti-Semitic?"

Shefman described the May 10 vote to keep Abu-Zahra "appalling," saying members probably just wanted to avoid a confrontation.

He said the school board has the power to remove Abu-Zahra.

Abu-Zahra told The CJN his life was "turned upside down" by the controversy.

"I'm not an anti-Semite or Holocaust denier. These are very serious allegations. What [Shefman] did to me was terrible. I couldn't sleep. I suffered. My family suffered," he said.

He said his intention in distributing the review of Finkelstein's book was to draw educators' attention to other examples of genocide. "This was a huge misunderstanding."

Abu-Zahra, who is in his first year on the race relations committee, said he apologized to the board for having offended anyone.

"It was not my intention to hurt anyone. I'm just here to help and this is what I get.

"My best friends are Jews."

He said he hopes the matter is over.

Bill Crothers, chair of the York Region District School Board, told The CJN the board would be "very reluctant" to do anything without input from the race relations committee.

Shoshana Weinberg, director of summer programming for NCSY, said the Orthodox youth group has seen its program participation plummet this summer. The five programs generally attract as many as 150 teenagers. This year, only 15 applied.

Rabbi Dan Rand, a spokesman for Aish Hatorah in Toronto, said their Israel program numbers, though modest at the best of times, are down substantially from previous years. Organizers were hoping to recruit 40 participants for an August fellowship trip to Israel, but as of last week, only two had registered.

Stephen Wolnek, president of United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, told the Rabbinical Assembly Convention in Toronto last week that the organization's trips to Israel would continue and that "all security arrangements are in place to protect our precious children."

Meanwhile, as hundreds of 20-somethings milled around Pearson airport, Susan Jackson, a spokesman for UJA Federation, one of the sponsors of the Birthright program, said security in Israel for the mission has been beefed up and a number of changes to the group's itinerary have been made to make the trip safer.

Participants will be lodged in kibbutz guest houses and in rural areas outside Israel's main cities during most of the 10-day trip, she said. That differs from practice in previous years when hotels in Israel's main centres were booked. In addition, there will be less unsupervised free time and mission participants will not be free to wander on their own in Israeli cities, she said.

The changes were made after consultations with concerned parents in order to enhance their "comfort level" as well as those of the participants, Jackson said.

Two days before the first flight departed Pearson, the management committee of Canada Israel Experience, the group that organizes the Birthright Israel program, gave the trip a green light, said Maxyne Finkelstein, executive vice-president of UIA Federations Canada.

"After long discussions, we decided to go ahead... It was a 'yes' but with a lot of concern," she said.

Isaac Osiel, 24, who left on his second Birthright trip to Israel as a madrich (counsellor), said his "incredible passion for Israel" prompted his participation. "I trust the Birthright system. Everything will be okay," he said.

Rachel Lurie, 25, said her family was concerned about the situation in Israel, "but not enough to pull out."

Vancouver native Ian Goodman, 20, admitted he was "a little worried about security. I had some doubts, but I got over them. It's never going to be 100 percent safe. At least we know the situation there and it's not going to be a surprise."

Dov Dimant, 21, and also from Vancouver, said his parents were more worried than he. "I think we'll be safe. They're taking appropriate measures."

Miriam Shaposhnik, 19, felt it was important to show Israelis that "we Jews are sticking together."

Samantha Borden, 21, and her sister Lindsay, 20, felt it was important to go to see the child health-care centre dedicated in the name of their late father, Alan, a former president of B'nai Brith Canada.

"We figured they weighed the options and if they think it's safe, we'll trust them," Lindsay said.

Beth Tikvah's Cantor Sapir prepares to leave Toronto

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — He may be a traditional Conservative chazzan, but Cantor Efraim Sapir is not averse to the use of popular music in synagogue services.

"It's very effective, but you have to use it judiciously. You can't popularize it to the point where anything goes," he said recently at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, where he has served for 17 years.

Cantor Efraim Sapir

In fact, the use of popular music has a longstanding precedent, according to Sapir, whose father's background was chassidic.

"What did Chassidim do? They took popular peasant music, or popular music of the day, and put it into their services. Many of the chassidic niggunim are purported to be borrowed from shepherds and gypsies."

The 55-year-old cantor, who has introduced chassidic and other tunes to his congregation, will leave Beth Tikvah in mid-July to take a position at Temple Emeth, a Conservative congregation in Delray Beach, Fla. Next week, on June 19, he will be fêted at Beth Tikvah with a tribute dinner and concert.

A proponent of congregational participation, Sapir says, "If you want to listen to me, take my recordings. If you're with me in the synagogue, I want you to join me, participate with me. I will maybe light the fire, but you have to burn with me."

In his new position, Sapir is to introduce at least two new pieces every Shabbat. Among the tunes he has introduced here are niggunim commissioned from Beth Tikvah's composer-in-residence, Srul Irving Glick.

Rabbi Wayne Allen, the synagogue's spiritual leader, lauded Sapir in a recent column in the Beth Tikvah bulletin for his "mellifluous yet earthy tenor voice that can inspire his listeners, [and his] wonderful knack of making every service seem fresh and novel."

And despite Sapir's traditional bent, he is leaving the non-egalitarian Beth Tikvah for an egalitarian congregation. Part of the appeal for both the chazzan and his wife Dvora, he admitted, is the warm climate, but he has, he noted, "trained a few young ladies here in Toronto to serve as chazzaniot. I have no problem with that."

Repeating a comment he has made publicly, he said that "if egalitarianism would open the floodgates of the synagogue, and we'll have people here day in and day out, I would say, 'Do it.'" He noted, in the context of that view, that Temple Emeth is a "very active, very committed, extremely well-attended" congregation.

Raised in a traditional, modern Orthodox home, Sapir is the son of Holocaust survivors who met after the war and made aliyah after marrying in Europe.

Ardent religious Zionists, the couple were part of a core kibbutz group formed in Europe, who set up a kibbutz near Petach Tikvah in 1945. In 1949, the kibbutz disbanded and the family moved to nearby Moshav Nechalim, where Sapir's parents still live.

Although he is the first chazzan in his family, Sapir grew up in a music-filled home, with myriad zemirot sung by his family every Friday night, Shabbat lunch and Shabbat afternoon.

His route to a cantorial career was somewhat circuitous, with studies toward a BA in English and voice at Syracuse University and toward a master's degree in education administration at the University of Nebraska and the University of Wisconsin, following army service in Israel and a year at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Served congregation for 17 years

It was in Milwaukee that he underwent an ideological transformation from Orthodox to Conservative, under the mentorship of Rabbi Herbert Panitch, who had undergone a similar transition.

At the same time he was pursuing his university education, Sapir held teaching and administrative educational positions and also served as a cantor. In 1978, he decided to devote himself to chazzanut, moving to Toronto with his first wife and three children to serve at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation from 1978 to 1982 and at Pride of Israel Congregation from 1982 to 1984 before taking the position at Beth Tikvah.

The immediate past president of the Toronto Council of Chazzanim, Sapir has a 1981 certificate of commission as Hazzan-Minister from the Cantors Assembly, the umbrella organization for Conservative cantors.

Although he loves what he does and has almost a dozen concert posters in his office (only the local ones, none from his performances in the States), he would not take the same indirect route to where he is now.

"If I would start today, I would definitely go into the cantorate – but I would do it differently."

War criminal dies before deportation hearing held

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Nazi war criminal Serge Kisluk died recently in St. Catharines while awaiting a date for a deportation hearing.

Kisluk, 78, was a former railway guard and a member of an auxiliary police force that collaborated with German forces in murdering Jews in Ukraine.

A Federal Court ruled in June 1999 that Kisluk knowingly concealed material facts about his wartime activities when he entered Canada in 1948, and that he obtained Canadian citizenship by fraud. In March 2000, Kisluk was informed he had lost his citizenship and was liable for deportation.

Kisluk maintained his innocence, and in his last testament, reported in the Globe and Mail, he stated: "I go to my death with a clean conscience, knowing that when I face God in heaven I will not be judged by the likes of those who crucified me here on this earth."

Kisluk's wife, Todosia, told the Globe her husband "was destroyed" by the immigration case, and that "our hearts were ripped out."

Friends and neighbours interviewed by the Globe were saddened by his death, and an Orthodox priest who ministered to Kisluk said he believed his claims of innocence.

Yet Justice Allan Lufty's 95-page judgment points out that in 1941 Kisluk volunteered for police service, even while he acknowledged he could have worked on a farm.

Kisluk was armed during his service under the Nazis, and the judge found that Kisluk "did not hesitate to use force in circumstances having nothing to do with minor police functions."

Kisluk "was involved in escorting the Jewish domestic worker for the Makovichi police station to her execution," Lufty stated.

Lufty's judgment also recounted the testimony of a witness in Ukraine who told the court he saw Kisluk and another policeman beat and kick a Jew, Moshko Goldschmidt. The witness testified that during the beating, Kisluk drew a gun and was about to shoot Goldschmidt when a neighbour pleaded with him not to do it in his house. Kisluk put his gun away and left.

Kisluk maintained that the evidence against him was part of a KGB plot, but Lufty rejected that suggestion. He also found Kisluk's version of events – including his description of the immigration screening process after the war – as not believable.

"Simply put, I do not believe [Kisluk's] testimony on any contentious issue," he stated.

Weizmann gala to honour Nortel chief

TORONTO — The Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science will celebrate the Israeli institution's 50th anniversary at a gala dinner on June 20.

Proceeds will go toward research in laser technology, said Canadian Society president Brian Steck. "As we advance in terms of laser technology, what can be achieved in microsurgery, laser in the eyes, open heart surgery or less invasive surgery, is quite outstanding."

In addition to raising a hoped-for $15 million for the research as a belated anniversary project (the institute was established in November 1949), Steck would like to raise awareness about the institute's activities. These include 1,000 research projects to fight disease and hunger, protect the environment, harness alternative sources of energy and find technology solutions for the future.

Steck is impressed by the quality of research done at the Institute, located in Rehovot. "Unlike a lot of other organizations, Weizmann is pure research ... This was something that amazed me.

"It was when I went to Israel and met with a number of the professors that I became very enthusiastic about how unique the Weizmann Institute is."

At the upcoming dinner, to be held at the Four Seasons Hotel with 350 to 400 guests expected to attend, John Roth, president and CEO of Nortel Networks, will be honoured for his work.

"Mr. Roth is an ideal role model for the 2,500 scientists, graduate students and technicians at the Weizmann Institute," said Steck in a news release that cited the company's history of building communications networks.

Murray Koffler, who is to receive an award recognizing him as a founder of the Canadian Society, said that the 50th anniversary is "quite a milestone."

In light of all the "turmoil, trouble and wars that Israel has had to go through," the high calibre of the institute is all the more remarkable, he said.

In the past decade, under the leadership of institute president Haim Harari, the whole campus, with more than 50 major buildings, has undergone a restructuring with new buildings and new disciplines, said Koffler, who is a former chair of the institute's board of governors.

"The laser facility is at the forefront of its field," he noted, adding that clinical trials in laser-based photodynamic therapy (PDT) for prostate cancer will begin this fall at Princess Margaret Hospital, in affiliation with the Weizmann Institute.

Premier Mike Harris with the CJC National President Keith Landy.

UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region, have prepared this supplement – the 3rd in a series – to keep our community informed about the recent provincial tuition tax credit for independent schools

"I said I was opposed to vouchers and I'm still opposed to vouchers and I remain opposed to vouchers. What I am in favour of, though, is excellence in education. I'm in favour of choice, and I am in favour of particularly low- and modest-income Ontarians getting a very modest tax credit to encourage and support their choice. These are parents who can't afford the luxury private schools you're talking about. These are parents, many of whom have scrimped and saved to send their children to the school of their choice, in many cases religion-based schools. They do not have the same opportunities the Catholic religion-based schools have in our province. That's why many other provinces have supported, with some varying degree, tax credits, not to schools, not to individual schools — not vouchers — but to parents to help them, particularly low- and middle-income Ontarians, be able to afford that choice. We believe it's fair, we believe it's right."

— Premier Mike Harris, May 14

"In this party and in this government, parental choice, giving parents the information they need to make intelligent decisions about schools, is something we believe in. We respect that. We've brought forward initiatives to increase parental voices and choices in the public system. We are respecting those who want to go into Montessori schools, Jewish schools, Hindu schools, Christian schools."

— Education Minister Janet Ecker, May 9

"We have been clear in favour of choice. From 1993 to 1994, in the Blueprint for Learning, we talked about choice for parents, choice for parents and their children. We are fully committed to full funding for public education in Ontario, to honouring the funding formula, which includes not only the public schools but also the Catholic schools and the francophone schools. But in addition, the government proposes to show respect for the choices of parents for their families, for their children, for their educational choices by investing additional funds for a tax credit for those parents. We respect their choices."

— Finance Minister Jim Flaherty, May31

"We have a new voucher program in Ontario effective today. This is a voucher in all but name. I would scrap any plan that puts forward vouchers. The budget ... shifts money from public education for working families to private schools for a wealthy few. If you own a corporation, have kids in private school, and have a big income, you win — but not for long, because this budget also fails our future."

— Dalton McGuinty, as cited in the National Post, May 10

Dear Mr. Harris and Mr. Flaherty,

We, the Toronto Board of Rabbis – an interdenominational board of Reform, Conservative, Reconstructionist and Orthodox rabbis, representing both congregational and organizational constituencies, applaud your government's recent decision to provide partial funding to parents who send their children to Jewish day schools. Many members of our various communities have chosen a full time religious education for their children and we feel grateful that there is no longer any discrimination between them and the Catholic community who have for years had this option funded.

We acknowledge the necessity of a vital and vibrant public school system, while at the same time, we recognize the profound contributions a religiously educated citizenry can provide.

We support this bold endeavour and encourage the continued civil dialogue of people of good will around this initiative. We will be encouraging the rabbis of our organization to address this crucial topic from their pulpits on Saturday, June 16th, 2001 and to express their support to the Provincial government for the funding of religious parochial schools.

Sincerely,

151 Eglinton Avenue W., Toronto, ON M4R 1A6

"Your plan [to extend tax credits to parents of children in independent schools] is a misguided and unacceptable attack on public education and it must be stopped."

— Howard Hampton (NDP), in a letter to Education Minister Janet Ecker, May 2001

UPDATE: Public hearings on the tax credit began on Saturday, June 9 in St. Catharines and will continue until June 19. The bill is expected to see final reading by the end of June.

ייִדיש־ווינקל
רעדאַגירט פֿון: אַלעק סילווער

דר. חיים זשיטלאָווסקי, זײַן לעבן און שאַפֿן

Learning from the past

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

TORONTO — Ten future educators currently attending York University have been awarded the opportunity to travel overseas and participate in a unique three-week program, titled Learning from the Past, Teaching for the Future.

The program, which includes seminars and trips to historic sites in Germany and Poland, will enable these students, as well as participants from Germany and Poland, to teach future generations about anti-Semitism, racism and the Holocaust.

"It's important for kids to learn [about the Holocaust and racism] so that nothing like it should ever happen again," says head of the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University, Michael Brown, who, along with professor Mark Webber, the associate director of the Canadian Centre for German and European Studies, was the visionary behind Learning from the Past.

"The more we know and understand, the less likely it is to happen in the future," he adds.

Jaya Gosine, one of York's participants, says the program "offers a unique opportunity for educators to talk about the importance of integrating an anti-racist, anti-bias perspective into their curriculum."

Brown says students and educators have some knowledge about the Holocaust, but not a great deal.

While the Holocaust is taught in Canada and Germany, and is starting to be discussed in schools in Poland, "there's a lot of room for sensitizing people and bringing it into the curriculum," says Brown.

"When you've seen firsthand the sites where the Holocaust was planned and took place, it makes you ready to [challenge] Holocaust deniers and downplayers," says Brown on why it is important for educators to visit European landmark sites.

Participants will leave for Germany on July 29, and begin their tour in the city of Worms, a site associated with Martin Luther. Seminars will be held at such places as the museum and memorial at Auschwitz, the Wannsee Conference House, where the decision to implement the Final Solution was made, and the Ravensbruck concentration camp for women. As well, students will travel to Treblinka, Chelmno and Warsaw.

The group will also meet with representatives of the Jewish community and other minority groups in Germany and Poland.

"By looking to the past we prepare teachers to lead their students towards a better future," says Webber. "By looking at others we not only overcome stereotypes about them, but also get to know ourselves better."

In February, the German and Polish participants will come to York for a one-week follow-up seminar about racism and anti-semitism, which will, in part, be open to the public.

Each of the ten students received a scholarship of an undisclosed sum, that, Brown says, covers most of the cost of the trip.

Scholarships were awarded based on grades, program of study, plans for the future, and the results of personal inverviews, Brown notes.

"We tried to choose the best of the lot – the ones that would get the most out of the experience," he says.

The project is funded by many private individuals and public organizations, some of which include the Heinrich Boll Foundation of the Green Party of Germany, the Office for Democratic Education of Baden-Wurttemberg, the federal government's Department of Canadian Heritage, York University, Allan and Hinda Silber, Al Schrage, Gerda Friedberg and Joseph Lebovic.

Students will be returning to Canada on August 22.

Why we're in Israel now.

"We came to Israel to celebrate our son's Bar Mitzvah. We knew it would be an unforgettable experience for the whole family. But considering all that is happening right now, this trip will mean a great deal more.

"In the days before the ceremony, we toured the holiest sites in Jerusalem. We saw the Dead Sea Scrolls, we walked through the Old City. Everything reminded us why it's so important to show our support now.

"When you're here, you see an Israel you don't see on the evening news. The shops and cafés in Jerusalem are filled with people. And everyone is so friendly and happy to see us.

"We could have had our son's Bar Mitzvah back home. But it would never be as meaningful. Especially now. You have to be here to feel the people's faith, and their passionate commitment to peace, and to this land.

"We want to give our children an experience that will stay with them for a lifetime. We can think of no better way than showing them Israel now."

Jeffrey & Cheri Cohn

Wallenberg Day proclaimed

50,000 inhabitants. In all, Wallenberg is credited with saving the lives of some 100,000 Hungarian Jews.

But on Jan. 17, 1945, the invading Soviets arrested the hero as an American spy and took him into "protective custody." He was never seen again, save for alleged sightings by former prisoners of the Soviet gulag. For decades, Soviet officials said Wallenberg had died of a heart attack in 1945 while in prison.

"Of his subsequent fate," said Copps, "we know only that it could not have been good."

Raoul Wallenberg Day will coincide with the anniversary of his arrest.

The Department of Canadian Heritage is planning an educational program in all of Canada's schools, to teach about Wallenberg's heroism and to inspire students to follow in his footsteps.

"Every year, students will remember the courage and the ingenuity of one person and how one person changed the world," Copps said.

Montreal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, who in the early 1990s headed an international commission of inquiry into Wallenberg's fate, described the announcement as "a hope fulfilled, a dream realized," and paid tribute to MP Clifford Lincoln, chair of the standing committee on Canadian heritage, and Senator Sheila Finestone, who all worked on the initiative for years.

Cotler also recognized the efforts of Dr. Vera Parnes, founder and president of the Raoul Wallenberg International Movement for Humanity.

The following evening, nearly 300 people attended a screening at the National Archives of Canada of the Canadian-made, award-winning documentary Raoul Wallenberg: Buried Alive, which has been shown around the world.

The event also marked the establishment of a humanitarian award to be presented annually to honour local people who perform good deeds without thought of reward or accolades.

"The reason that this award is different from others," explained Fisher, "is that the purpose is to recognize people on the front lines of working with people, people whose efforts have not been recognized to date."

To be known as the Lending Hand Award, the honour will be marked by a special sculpture commissioned from sculptor Bruce Garner, and will be accompanied by a $1,000 donation to the individual's chosen cause or charity.

Nominations are being solicited, and the first award will be presented Oct. 21.

"We would like to challenge other major cities to also initiate a Lending Hand Award," Fisher said. He has spoken to Cotler about the possibility of the local committee assisting the government in spreading the message.

Also last week, Cotler rose in the House of Commons to praise the proclamation, saying it is "an historic initiative that will have enduring resonance."

Rabbi Lau addresses memorial service

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel's Chief Ashkenazi Rabbi Israel Meir Lau has a message for would-be Palestinian terrorists.

"[Your leaders] lie to you. They cheat you," he declared in an impassioned address at a memorial service held here Sunday evening for the victims of the June 1 suicide bomb outside a Tel Aviv disco. Of the 20 who died and more than 120 who were wounded, many were recent immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

"[Your leaders] are sitting in the mosques, in the houses, in the palaces, and they send you young, stupid boys, telling you that you will become shaheed – holy – and you will inherit paradise. I tell you very open[ly], very frankly, someone who is doing [time] in Hell for the other can never inherit paradise.

"If you destroy families, if you kill innocent people, this means shaheed? This means paradise?"

Rabbi Lau, in town to speak that night at an event organized by Canadian Friends of Laniado Hospital, joined Offer Isseroff, regional director, the Jewish Agency for Israel; Israeli consul Zehavit Ben Hillel, and Rabbi Yosef Zaltzman, executive director of the Jewish Russian Community Centre, on the podium as the main speakers. Members of local Zionist youth movements lit yizkor candles in memory of the 20 victims who were killed.

The Palestinian youngster was seen crouching near his father in a photo that sparked controversy internationally. "He was in a crossfire,"said Rabbi Lau. "I swear we didn't see there was a child there. There was a crossfire, and it is not sure whose bullet killed that child."

In contrast, the chief rabbi spoke of five-month-old Yehuda Shoham, now in a coma after being hit by "just a stone in the midst of a ceasefire" and 10-month-old Shalhevet Pass, whose killing in Hebron was deliberate, he emphasized. "[The killer used] a telescopic gun. He didn't send the bullet unless the cross of the telescope was exactly on the face of a baby of 10 months."

Rabbi Lau's voice reverberated across Mel Lastman Square at the open-air service co-sponsored by six Jewish organizations – B'nai Brith Canada, Canada-Israel Committee, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region; Canadian Zionist Federation, the Jewish Agency for Israel and UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto – as he articulated the Jewish definition of holiness: "To bring life, to save a life, not to kill!"

The Jewish people will never give up and will never leave Israel, he vowed, as the English-, Russian- and Hebrew-speaking audience of about 600 people broke into applause.

Ben Hillel memorialized the youngsters who died as an inspiration. "In the midst of the current turmoil, they did not cower into the shadow. They lived. They… were not about to be held hostage to any fears or intimidation."

She called on the audience to show support by going to Israel. "Your solidarity is more important now than ever."

Rabbi Zaltzman suggested countering the recent terrorism with daily acts of goodness and kindness. "That is at least partially to fill the void, because our young people, brothers and sisters, cannot do it any more."

Hamiltonians take to the streets to help Kiev Jews

By JULIA KOLLEK
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON – On the first Sunday in June, more than 300 people of all ages walked or biked from Hamilton to Kiev – symbolically at least.

The 10-kilometre walkathon from the JCC has become an annual event, and was inspired three years ago by community members who returned from a UJA mission to the former Soviet Union.

Money raised goes toward providing food and medical aid to Jews living in Ukraine, and serves to heighten community awareness about their difficulties.

With the help of local businesses and a large donation from Apotex, a pharmaceutical company, the event raised more than $18,000.

Organizers Susan Roth and Lester Krames, who is chair of Hamilton's Kosher Food Bank Committee, were members of a mission to Kiev in the winter of 1999.

"We wanted to bring attention internationally to what is happening there," said Krames.

Elderly woman outside the house in which she lives. Inside she shares a small room with only a bed and a table as furniture.

Roth also felt moved to help when she saw for herself the conditions in which people live.

"There is economic decline and political havoc, which is terrible for everyone. There are about 500,000 Jews in Ukraine, and they still suffer discrimination. They have 'Jew' stamped in their passports, and it is hard for the young people to get into schools and universities.

"Under the Soviet regime, when religion was banned, many Jews inter-married, and religious knowledge was lost."

With help from Jewish organizations, the young people are leaving, mostly immigrating to Israel, leaving behind the elderly – many of whom lived through the Holocaust and now receive a government pension of $15 per month on which they cannot survive.

Lorne Gaffe and Andrea Cutler saw for themselves the squalid living conditions endured by Jews in Kiev. They recently went on a five-day federation mission to Kiev, after being invited by Hamilton's new Young Adult Division.

Lorne Gaffe (standing) sees a computer lab for youngsters training for jobs once they make aliyah to Israel.

They travelled in a group with 20 others from North America and Israel. They were driven straight from the Kiev airport to Babi Yar, the wooded ravine where, during the Holocaust, more than 33,000 Jews were taken and shot in a two-day massacre. More than half of the Jews living in Ukraine were murdered by the Nazis and collaborators in the Holocaust.

Today, Ukraine is still home to the third largest Jewish community in Europe.

As Cutler and Gaffe discovered, many of those left are elderly, sick, and in need of food and other necessities.

Cutler was taken outside the city to meet one elderly woman. Through an interpreter, she told Cutler that her parents had fled to Siberia during the war. She had somehow survived alone, and now lives in a tiny one-room apartment with a sick daughter.

There was a small ring burner on during their visit. While she learned that gas is still supplied free to homes, Cutler asked why the burner was kept on all the time. The old lady replied that she had to do this because she had nothing with which to re-light it.

"There was no toilet, so I asked her where that was, and she pointed outside." With no outhouse in sight, the visitors realized the woman's toilet was literally outside.

There are Jewish organizations working to help those in the area. The group was taken to the Jewish Agency Education Centre in Kiev, set up by Israelis who came in the 1960s. The plain-looking building offers a daily soup kitchen, social programs, a clinic for those needing medical help, a library, a computer lab – even a hairdresser.

A small workshop created jobs for those with skills to repair TVs, irons and other household items.

On Sundays, the rooms are used as classrooms where some children travel eight hours by train or bus to spend the day learning Hebrew, dancing and socializing. Parents stay to study Hebrew in their own ulpan.

Those who are eligible can apply to make aliyah there, and the office has an open satellite phone line to Jerusalem, enabling family members to speak to relatives already there.

A chesed mobile takes hot meals and care packages of food, soap and medical supplies to those in outlying areas on a daily basis. Some of the volunteers are social workers from Israel who come to help for several years at a time.

"Jews help Jews," said Gaffe. "Whenever we talk about giving money to Israel, we tend to forget that Israel helps Jews all over the world."

Gaffe was also impressed by the young people from Kiev in the Hillel who were helping the elderly. "How many university students do you know who would give up their time to do this?"

Cutler said she came back from her trip with a new perspective on life.

"This trip made me value everything we have here – even the paper and pen you're holding, or that we have toothbrushes to brush our teeth. For the $25 a month that many of us might leave as a tip at a restaurant, you can feed a family in Kiev for a month.

"I learned not just about what was happening there, but [also] about our own Jewish community. Most people are passive, [but] I want to be involved, and we need others to feel the same [way]."

Gaffe agreed. "I want to build a strong community here for our kids and families. Although we couldn't communicate with the people we met in Kiev, the Havdalah we shared was warm – we were singing arm-in-arm. I want our kids to be able to go anywhere else in the world and have a sense of tradition and values."

Some end of parliamentary session thoughts

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

By the time you read this, MPs will be busy cleaning out their desks for the summer recess – which will last until the leaves, just now budding on the Ottawa maples, begin to turn colour in the autumn.

So what kind of parliamentary session was it? Not a whole lot was accomplished on the legislative side, but boy did the House rock on the political front! No one exits this session unscathed, although some have only to tend to superficial cuts while others have yet to staunch the flow from deep, career-threatening wounds.

Jane Stewart was hard-pressed to believe her boss 18 months ago when he re-assured her that if she could just tough it out, the storm would pass. Well, her storm did pass, and, obviously, so did his. The "Affaire Grand Mère" that dominated the news for much of the Parliamentary session fizzled, and was overtaken by more exciting developments.

The prime minister's instincts and determination to "hang tough" demonstrate again why he has survived all the "knife wounds in his back" over the years. It would be a grave mistake for anyone – friend or foe – to underestimate his capacity to withstand punishment and still remain on top.

Stockwell Day did not fare as well. Either the cabal aligned against him is so sophisticated or he is just not up to the task of protecting his turf and consolidating his leadership. Whatever the case, there is virtually no chance that he can endure the systematic erosion of his personal support and the damage his presence is doing to the fortunes of the Canadian Alliance. Chuck Strahl and company win no points for deserting the caucus in so destructive a fashion; their mischief will return to haunt them. However, many in the small "c" conservative ranks are relieved that at least the mutiny served as a catalyst to jettison the "Sea-Do Wonder."

The Bloc Québécois has actually used the last session of Parliament to strengthen itself, mostly due to the widespread anticipation of an election call in Quebec that will see the Charest Liberals replace the Landry PQ. It proves Quebec really does belong in Canada because historically, the Bloc has always ensured a strong pro-Quebec nationalist presence in Ottawa whenever there is a federalist government in power provincially. It's that Canadian balance thing. Gilles Duceppe has done a good job improving the overall Bloc performance in Ottawa (by diminishing his personal role), and it has not gone unnoticed back home. That should allow the Bloc MPs to raise enough cash over the next few months to keep them in focus when the House returns.

As for Joe Clark and Alexa McDonough, their respective assessments are so complicated, we will have to devote future columns to each of them…stay tuned.

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Last Sunday, Israel welcomed CIA chief George Tenet's blueprint for a lasting truce, but the Palestinians expressed reservations about the plan.

As a result of the Palestinian reservations, the Israeli-Palestinian meeting of security chiefs due to be held under Tenet's auspices Sunday was postponed to Monday, when the Palestinians were slated to submit their official response. (At press time, this response was unavailable.)

The "kitchen cabinet" decided to accept the Tenet plan on one condition: that the Palestinian Authority completely stop the violence – including stone-throwing, which it has said in the past is not covered by the ceasefire – and fully implement all other elements of the plan, including arresting wanted terrorists, ending media incitement and collecting illegal weapons. Only once this has occurred is Israel willing to fulfil its obligations under the plan, such as ending the closure, withdrawing its forces to the positions they occupied before the intifadah began and freezing settlement construction.

Defence officials worried about supervisory mechanisms

"Mr. Tenet suggested the best thing, if not the most perfect, to both sides in order to enter into an actual ceasefire," Foreign Minister Shimon Peres told reporters.

But defence officials said they were worried about the lack of effective supervisory mechanisms in the plan. Since PA Chairman Yasser Arafat declared his ceasefire last week, there have been over 200 Palestinian attacks on Israelis, IDF Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz said.

The Palestinians, for their part, are adamantly opposed to the demand that they arrest Hamas and Islamic Jihad terrorists. They also want to shorten the cooling-off period before diplomatic negotiations resume, and they want definite dates for Israeli obligations.

Senior Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat insisted Sunday that the PA remains committed to the Mitchell report, on which Tenet's plan is based. Asked how this accords with the PA's objection to arresting terrorists – one of the key elements of the report – he responded: "If you find the words 'Hamas' and 'Islamic Jihad' in the Mitchell report, let me know."

Arafat told reporters after his talks with Swedish Prime Minister Goran Persson and EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana that EU observers were helping to oversee the truce as part of an agreement the EU brokered with Israel.

"Where the EU security teams are operating, things are on the right track," Arafat said. Western diplomats said Israel had privately agreed to the initiative, which involves four EU observers in the West Bank and Gaza.

But Sharon told Persson, whose country currently holds the EU presidency, that the EU's unbalanced policy toward the current conflict makes it impossible for Israel to grant Europe a greater role in resolving it. Persson said after meeting Arafat in Ramallah that he hoped the IDF's accidental killing of three Palestinian women in Gaza Sunday would not destroy the truce.

U.S. Middle East envoy William Burns, who has been holding talks on a timetable for implementing the Mitchell report, issued a statement Sunday criticizing both Israel and the Palestinians over the women's deaths.

"We believe the IDF should ensure that the response to any gunfire emanating from Palestinian populated areas minimizes the danger to the lives and property of Palestinian civilians," the statement said. "At the same time, the continued shooting attacks and other violence that have resulted in several Israeli casualties over the past few days must stop."

EU tries to boost presence

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The European Union (EU) is trying to set up a network of observers whose job would be to supervise any ceasefire between Israel and the Palestinian Authority. This is being done in co-ordination with the Palestinians, without Israel's approval.

Comment

The EU even set up an "operations room" in Bethlehem which it later closed after pressure was applied by Israel. EU envoys have asked that observers also be deployed to the Rafiah and Netzarim areas. Israel sees such moves as especially serious since they were not co-ordinated with or approved by the government.

If a ceasefire agreement had been concluded between the two sides, some here might have supported the idea of allowing EU representatives to supervise such an agreement. However, the defence establishment is adamantly opposed to the EU's moves since it means its representatives enter areas where terrorist attacks and military operations are frequent. Critics say the volunteer observers are being put at risk by those who approve such a project.

Some see the EU initiative as another of the recent attempts to increase international involvement in the territories without Israel's approval. In sending its people into Bethlehem, the EU is deemed to have taken advantage of the fact that it has a permanent defence technical team stationed in Israel.

An apartment was rented in Bethlehem and maps of the area were hung on the walls. The Palestinians were told the envoys intended to monitor the ceasefire in and around Beit Jala, Bethlehem and Beit Sahour. A British man with a background in intelligence was placed at the helm.

The EU's request to place observers in Rafiah and Netzarim, where clashes with Palestinians are frequent, was shot down by the defence establishment, and the government objected to the EU's political and military involvement in the area. Mounting pressure from Israel forced the closure of the Bethlehem "operations room" and the EU has been prohibited from deploying observers to other trouble spots.

Some Western European countries are believed to still be transferring money to the PA to pay the wages of Palestinian security officers. The British are financing the Palestinians' security negotiating team as well as advising them how to negotiate with Israel on military matters.

Decision on Maccabiah Games pending

Nancy Rubin, national executive director of Maccabi Canada, said that as of late Sunday, no decision had been made on whether to proceed with the Games.

Canadian athletes had been told to expect a definitive announcement by Wednesday of this week, but late reports out of Israel stated that the MWU agreed to requests from Vilna'i to wait one week before making a final decision.

Vilna'i persuaded the international delegates to hold off on a definite "no" until they report back to their respective countries to hear opinions "on the ground" there.

A sports ministry source said after the meeting that agreement to postpone a decision was made more from politeness than from a genuine intention to review the situation. The delegates had already made up their minds to postpone, the source said, and that was why a meeting with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon had been cancelled.

The international delegates said they would rather wait for the situation to calm and then have a "bigger and better" Games rather than to have only a small number of participants take part.

Roy Salomon, president of Maccabi Canada and a member of the international executive, was present at the Israel meetings.

"I'm coming to these meetings expecting anything," Salomon said, prior to his departure for Israel. "We'll meet to put these rumours [of cancellation] to rest. We want to have everyone around the world express their reasons for postponing or not postponing."

Postponement "is certainly a very strong consideration. It's an option to consider."

The American contingent, which started out with 600 athletes, has shrunk to 300. The American delegation was reported to have suggested postponing the Games until next summer.

Other delegations also expressed reservations about holding the Games in the midst of a Palestinian uprising that has seen bloody terrorist attacks in the heart of Israeli cities. The Manchester Jewish Telegraph reported last week that the British team was seriously considering pulling out of the Games while other reports suggested Germany was considering the same course of action.

Held in Israel every four years, the Maccabiah Games attract around 4,000 athletes, coaches and officials. Canada's delegation is usually one of the largest foreign contingents in Israel.

Salomon acknowledged that about 20 percent of the Canadian team had pulled out of the Games, although he suggested those numbers could be supplemented with alternate athletes.

Maccabi Canada did not formulate a specific position prior to the weekend meetings. Rather, it was taking a wait and see approach and wanted to hear the views of all other participants. "Safety of the athletes really has to be on the table," Salomon said.

One of the teams that could be seriously affected by athlete withdrawals is the junior boys baseball team, aged 14-16, coached by Mark Bendahan. Four of his 17 athletes have given notice they won't be travelling to Israel.

"Most of the players would love to go, but because it's a junior team, it's the parents who feel the pressure, especially those not coming along," he said. "I can't argue with parents who feel their kids won't be safe."

George Shermer, coach of the 11-man volleyball team, said he has had no defections yet, although "a couple of parents of younger players asked me if it's safe to go."

Brian Revin, coach of the 15-man softball team, said it's likely he'll lose one player for sure, perhaps three or four others, if the games go ahead as planned.

Bob Bregman, coach of the tennis team, said one of his four athletes has withdrawn. The others "have concerns, but they're not jumping off the ship. Any reasonable individual would have concerns."

Neil Rothenberg, coach of the junior girls basketball team, said he hasn't yet lost any of his 10 players. "However, I'm very concerned whether we can field a team if the Games go on.

The mass defections are being felt in Israel as well. "We're in a bad situation," admitted MWU honorary secretary Amir Peled. "It doesn't appear that we have enough competitors to hold serious competitions. But if the overseas delegations come back to us in a few days and say there's an improvement in their registration figures, we're ready to hold the games."

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres said Sunday it would be a "serious mistake" to cancel the Games, even if only a small number of participants ultimately turned up. "We cannot allow fear to force us to surrender to the threat of terror," he said.

My son's fish is broken

BY SHLOMIT LUCICH
Special to The CJN

Feature

Every morning on the way to nursery school, my kids and I drive past a fish. Not a real fish, mind you, and actually not really a fish at all, but rather a paper/plaster mock- up of a shark's head that sticks out of a wall. It's one of the high points of my four-year-old son's day, and definitely the high point of his morning ride. If we're lucky, we stop at a red light and get a good look, and if not, I slow down as my little boy smiles and shouts with glee, "Fish! Fish!" After a few rounds of "Fish, fish," his two-year-old sister joins in, and I feel like I'm either in an aquarium or on my way to the fish market. Yet that silly fish without a doubt brightens their day.

Well, it's now broken. The logo above the entrance to the Dolphi Discotheque at Tel Aviv's Dolphinarium, my son's fish was blown up Friday, June 1, along with 20 innocent souls. When my children and I went to the site to light a memorial candle, we saw that the fish was only half of what it had been. But my son was more concerned about our real reason for being there. In the most non-threatening way I could find, I had explained to my children that children bigger than them had died there and we had come to pray for their souls. With a quizzical look on his face, my son asked why somebody had "died" those children. I gave him the only answer I knew: I really didn't know.

When we arrived at the Dolphinarium, the kids ran to look at all the flowers that had been left in remembrance and returned to me when I tried to light the memorial candle. The wind, as well as my emotions, were out of control, and one kind soul finally lit the candle for us. My son asked me why I couldn't light the candle, but I couldn't answer.

As we bent down to place the candle on the ground, my son took one of my hands and my little girl the other. We kneeled down, said the Shema, and then asked God to protect the souls of everyone who had died there. My son then did what too many children have been doing lately – he comforted a parent.

"Don't cry, Mommy," my son said. "It's okay."

We rose and left to go to my son's nursery school. This time, however, it was my little girl who started the fish chant. And this time, the lyrics were changed. In a singsong voice, she chanted, "Fish broken, fish broken," until finally her brother joined in. At nursery school, my son hurried to tell his teacher about where he had been. All he said was, "Fish broken, BOOM!" I hadn't ever said, "Boom," and he never heard "Boom," but he knew. He knew.

My son's fish is broken. And, like everyone else who lives here, Jew and Arab alike, so is my heart.

Reporting should not be editorializing

According to Reports

Ordinarily, when innocent civilians become victims of particularly gruesome acts of violence, it is not difficult for journalists to report the facts in a straightforward manner.

However, when it comes to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, some of the media who hold strong personal views may have to make a special effort to keep them in abeyance. When these efforts fail the results can be troubling.

Reporting on the Tel Aviv nightclub bombing the morning after the attack, Paul Koring, the Globe and Mail's Washington correspondent, had no sooner announced the death toll and President George W. Bush's "demand" for Yasser Arafat's condemnation then he added: "Mr. Bush's statement made no mention of the Israeli role in the cycle of violence over the past eight months."

This gratuitous comment was particularly offensive given the horrific slaughter of Israeli innocents. There is no moral equivalence, as Koring's remark implies, between the deliberate murder of civilians and efforts by Israel to act in self-defence. Moreover, only later did Koring even acknowledge that, for the preceding week, Israel had been abiding by a unilateral ceasefire. Unmentioned was the restraint Israel showed during a significant upsurge in Palestinian terror which claimed the lives of scores of Israelis.

The Tel Aviv bombing itself became a relatively minor "bookend" item in Koring's report. He placed far more emphasis on trying to shield Arafat from implied U.S. criticism that Koring seemed to find irksome. The attack, Koring asserted, "bore the hallmarks of Hamas, which has rejected Mr. Arafat's peace efforts… The militant Islamic group's cells operate in clear defiance of the Palestinian Authority's shaky control over the West Bank and Gaza Strip."

Arafat's "peace efforts"? Hamas operating in "clear defiance" of Arafat? Does Koring really need to be reminded that it was Arafat who rejected a negotiated peace in favour of violence and that it was Arafat himself who released from jail the same Islamic extremists who now carry out terrorist attacks against Israelis, evidently in frequent co-ordination with elements of his own security forces? It is particularly galling that Koring portrays Arafat as a "peacenik" trying to rein in extremists while he characterizes Sharon only as "the hawkish right-winger."

One could continue dissecting Koring's article, but the point must be made: It is one thing for journalists to try to provide the broader political context to the immediacy of events, but it is quite another to use this context to drive particular political views. Reporting is not editorializing. Subsequent Globe reports from Israel describing the aftermath of the Tel Aviv attack were far more fair-minded, it must be noted.

Sharansky says Arafat must put halt to violence

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – The ceasefire between Israel and the Palestinian Authority will break down unless the PA decides to stem the current wave of violence, Israel's deputy prime minister warned last week.

In a conference call from New York City with journalists from the North American Jewish press, Sharansky urged PA President Yasser Arafat to immediately arrest Palestinians implicated in attacks against Israelis since the start of the intifadah eight months ago.

Natan Sharansky

Asked whether Arafat has the power to stop the violence, Sharansky replied, "Absolutely yes. He's inspiring, inciting and orchestrating terrorist activities."

Charging that Arafat is cleverly feigning weakness by claiming that he has less than full control of the situation on the ground, Sharansky demanded a crackdown on terrorist forces in Palestinian autonomous areas of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

"If Arafat can't deliver, he's not our partner," he declared, adding that the Palestinian leader ceased being a partner after the eruption of the uprising.

Sharansky, who is also minister of housing and construction, said that Israel's patience is wearing thin.

"We can't continue like this. He has to stop [the violence] immediately, and start cooperating with stopping terrorism."

Deputy PM speaks to North American Jewish press

Sharansky predicted that the Israeli army will enter Area A, under full Palestinian civil and security control, should Arafat refuse to deal with terrorism.

Two weeks ago, Sharansky said that if the truce collapses, Israel would invade Area A to "destroy the military and terrorist infrastructure in the PA."

He urged Arafat to return to the negotiating table, but suggested that his real goal is Israel's destruction.

Turning to Israel's settlements in the terrritories, Sharansky denied reports that Israel and the U.S. have worked out a plan for an Israeli settlement freeze.

He declared that Israel will not pay a price in concessions to persuade Arafat to end the violence.

Israel, however, has accepted the recommendations of the recent Mitchell report, he noted.

The report, which has also been embraced by the PA, calls for an immediate ceasefire and a cooling off period, followed by mutual confidence-building measures, and a resumption of bilateral negotiations.

He claimed that the present Israeli government's policy on settlements is no different than that of the late Yitzhak Rabin's policy.

Elaborating, Sharansky said that the government channels funds only to settlements within the national consensus.

Sharansky acknowledged that there are serious differences of opinion in the national unity government on security matters.

But on these broad issues, a consensus nevertheless exists.

The recent suicide bombing at a Tel Aviv disco that claimed the lives of 20 Israelis, notably Jewish immigrants from the former Soviet Union, may have a chilling effect on Jewish aliyah from Russia, he conceded.

But Sharansky said that the proportion of Russian Jews leaving Israel is no higher than from any other group.

Russian Jews already living in Israel will not leave solely because of this incident.

Sharansky made these comments against the backdrop of several developments:

• PA leaders said that they do not intend to arrest members of such organizations as Hamas and Islamic Jihad, which took responsibility for the disco blast.

• Gen. Amos Malka, chief of Israeli military intelligence, believes that the ceasefire is temporary.

• Dan Naveh, a minister in the Israeli cabinet, charged that Arafat has not taken "substantive measures" against terrorists,.

• In a Jerusalem demonstration organized by Jewish settlers, thousands of Israelis called on Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to end his policy of restraint and fight the PA in an all-out war.

• Tel Aviv University's Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies released a report saying that 58 percent of Israelis support the Oslo peace process.

Research group monitors Palestinian media

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Yitzhak Sokoloff has been analyzing the Palestinian media for about five years – well before the latest round of violence flared up – and what he's seen bears little resemblance to the face of Palestinian nationalism seen here in the West.

The erudite arguments of Hanan Ashrawi and Saeb Erakat, with their references to rights, resolutions and and dignity, rarely appear on Palestinian TV or radio, he said.

Instead, Palestinian consumers of mass media are subjected to a daily diet of officially sanctioned propaganda in which peace with Israel is deligitimized, Jews dehumanized, violence extolled and children urged to martyr themselves for Palestine. Religious leaders are shown preaching to their flocks to "kill the Jews."

"It echoes the ferocity of the propaganda intended to incite Germans to kills Jews in the 1930s, coupled with the impact of television and the dehumanization of Jews," Sokoloff said.

A native of Boston who made aliyah 25 years ago, Sokoloff is senior analyst and assistant director of Palestinian Media Watch (PMW), an independent, privately funded research institute established in 1996 to monitor the Palestinian media and school curricula.

With a team of six Arabic language translators who formerly served in Israeli army intelligence, the PMW scans three Palestinian newspapers, several radio stations and a single television network every day. The team translates what they see and distributes their findings to the Israeli and foreign media. PMW's findings have been cited in papers of record such as the New York Times, several Israeli dailies, and in publications in Hungary, Romania, Egypt and Sweden.

PMW has been asked by Israel's Office of the Prime Minister to prepare detailed studies of the Palestinian media, and PMW founder and director Itamar Marcus has briefed members of the U.S. Congress on the group's research.

"What we're trying to do is expose the true face of the Palestinians, because this face speaks Arabic, not English," Sokoloff said.

Sokoloff, who was in Toronto recently for several speaking engagements, said the Palestinian media operates under the control of Yasser Arafat's Palestinian Authority.

They are "educating their own people that the true purpose [of negotiations] is not peace with Israel, but to tilt the balance of power so that the original goal of liberating Palestine from Israel can be reached," Sokoloff stated.

He pointed to a sermon broadcast from a Gaza mosque that explicitly stated that "all agreements with Israel are temporary."

The Palestinian media reinforces the belief that it is not possible to compromise on the claim to all of the territory from the Jordan River to the Mediterranean Sea and it repeatedly dehumanizes Jews through such devices as a dramatized rape scene by Israeli soldiers, while also claiming that Israelis are poisoning Palestinian water, he said.

Children are being incited to violence in a horrifying way, he continued. In a video broadcast repeatedly, Muhammed al-Dura, the Palestinian youth killed in a crossfire in Gaza as his father attempted to shield him, is seen speaking to Palestinian children from heaven, where he is seen flying a kite in sunny, pastoral fields.

"It's a romanticization of heaven, making it attractive for 11-year-olds to kill themselves," Sokoloff said.

That fits in with the current Palestinian plan ,which is "to kill as many Israelis to weaken our resolve, and kill as many children as possible to get international sympathy...The Palestinian Authority is manipulating the children of their community in a horrendous fashion," Sokoloff maintained.

Sokoloff acknowledges that accepting that conclusion is difficult for people from Western cultural backgrounds.

"It's difficult for people in the West to confront the possibility that the Palestinians really mean what they say. There is a tremendous cultural arrogance in certain circles in Israel and abroad that assumes the Palestinian goals are the same as ours."

The PMW attempts to present to a wider audience the exact words being used by the Palestinian media. It is the PMW's belief that "the first step to being able to move to peace is to understand the true nature of the situation and the true nature of the Palestinians."

As part of his North American visit, Sokoloff met with legislators on Capitol Hill, where he is pushing for a Senate hearing on the Palestinian media's encouragement of children to commit suicide.

CIBC makes difference in community

As Community Manager for East Toronto, Dave D'Amico has a twofold responsibility: one, to ensure a high quality of service within his member branches; and two, to promote goodwill and improve the quality of life in the surrounding community.

Dave D'Amico
East Toronto Community Manager
416-421-0051

Not unique to East Toronto, this approach is part of a company-wide commitment to providing help where help is needed. Underscoring this fact, in 2000 the CIBC donated some $35 million to a wide variety of charities and causes, including the Baycrest Centre, Mount Sinai Hospital, Community Centre 55, Toronto East General Hospital, several schools, and countless community projects.

D'Amico favours a hands-on approach that sees him personally participating in fund-raising and other charitable events. He also takes pleasure in encouraging employees, associates and friends to do likewise.

D'Amico brings to the table an extensive background in both banking and volunteer work. And as someone who has lived and worked in the East Toronto area for a number of years, he is well-positioned to turn CIBC's strong presence in the area (19 branches) to good account.

Building goodwill starts within each branch, he says. "We want every single visit to be a happy one for our customers. This is a standard we strive to uphold each and every day." Good works outside the branch are a natural extension of this philosophy, he says. "We want people to think of the CIBC not only as a great place to bank, but as a good neighbour."

D'Amico's approachability, easygoing manner and work ethic have endeared him to East Toronto business people and members of the general community, and he relishes the opportunity to serve. The sense that he is helping to make a difference gives him "all the gratification I need. Giving back to the community isn't something that's nice to do, it's something we have to do."

Klezmer and beyond

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

TORONTO — No matter how talented you are, virtually every artist will tell you sometimes all you need is a break.

Beyond the Pale had recorded their debut CD and were set to release it independently when trouble with the artwork pushed back its scheduled release date by at least two months. It was during this time Stein, 28, was returning home from Montreal.

"By coincidence I was sitting next to the owner of Borealis Records," Stein, the band's mandolin and tsimbl player says. "He saw me with a mandolin case and we started talking and I gave him a copy of our demo."

The next day Stein got a phonecall and a deal with Borealis was struck.

Routes, the band's recently released debut CD, is a collection of contemporary and traditional klezmer songs with a bit of reggae and acoustic funk. Seven of the 12 songs are original compositions.

Just because it's klezmer doesn't mean it has to sound like something played in a shtetl a hundred years ago, Stein stresses.

"Klezmer music should not be a museum piece, it should evolve. What I do now is progressive, unique and marketable."

On the CD, traditional klezmer songs are given new life and the original songs were composed in klezmer form and style.

"We compose original music using traditional forms and we reinterpret traditional songs in different ways," Stein says. "For example, I use the tsimbl (a hammered dulcimer) as a lead instrument. I also transcribe solos originally written for clarinet for the tsimbl, which is rather unique."

In fact, he says, the original klezmer bands didn't use the tsimbl or the mandolin. "Original klezmer music used only a violin and clarinet. The mandolin is not considered a klezmer instrument."

Being a progressive klezmer band can be a double-edged sword. "For us playing klezmer is not about nostalgia and this is an issue I'm faced with a lot," he says, referring to audiences requesting traditional klezmer songs. "It's a really fine line to walk, keeping our audience happy and getting them to listen to our original songs.

"I accept that we're going to lose some people, but to cling to something that is only rooted in the past is counter- productive."

That's not to say Routes isn't a klezmer CD. The violin (played by Anne Lindsay) and clarinet (Martin Van de Ven) are a huge part of the band's sound, and Sasha Luminsky's accordion is on the forefront of songs like Agnia – a Romanian-style dance song. Bert Higgins on bass rounds off the lineup.

"There's a huge cult of authenticity in klezmer – people saying, 'You don't play that note right,' or 'You don't sound Jewish' – in fact, I find myself doing the same thing to other bands," Stein admits.

"The songs on our CD are written in the style of klezmer forms. There are a few songs on it that aren't klezmer that show the width of our palette. Some academics may have trouble with us calling it klezmer – but so be it.

"Today Yiddish folk music and Yiddish theatre music – which to academics are apart from klezmer – are all absorbed into the reality of what's become the klezmer revival."

Stein started playing mandolin after playing bass in a rock band for 10 years.

"I picked up the mandolin primarily to play bluegrass and then the klezmer revival swept me up in that direction. Klezmer felt more natural than bluegrass; it's something I can feel."

Beyond the Pale

His background – he's got a master's degree in history – was a natural segue into klezmer. "There's a cult of academia in the klezmer world. There's a lot of research in this music, so playing klezmer is tied into something I did scholastically."

Klezmer is defined as the instrumental folk music of Eastern European Jews.

"In reality, it's a fusion of styles influenced by Hungarian, Polish, Gypsy and other such cultures."

Beyond the Pale will be turning one of its songs from the CD – ChasenJah– into a short film for BravoTV. "It's about a Jewish man who marries a Jamaican woman."

The film – to be shot in September – has a dance scene choreographed by Allen Kaeja and is to feature a huge wedding scene. If you want to be a guest in this wedding scene, give Stein a call at 416-482-2699.

In the meantime, you can catch the band live at a CJN co-sponsored event July 1 at the Canada Day celebrations at Downsview Park with headliners Tom Cochrane and Kim Mitchell. Beyond the Pale is scheduled to play at 3 p.m. You can also hear them June 30 at Harbourfront, July 4 at the Yiddish Festival at Mel Lastman Square, and in British Columbia later that month.

Routes is available in major record stores or by calling 1-877-530-4288. You can also visit the record company's Web site, www.borealisrecords.com.

Across Oceans brings artists and performers to Toronto

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

Maxine Heppner, a Toronto-based choreographer, performer and teacher, is the visionary behind Across Oceans, The At Home Festival, an interdisciplinary three-week pilot project that brings together artists, dancers, musicians and performers from around the world and from across Canada to Toronto.

As Heppner explains, the word "across" is particularly revealing. "It works across geographical boundaries, across arts boundaries, across generational boundaries, and across the divide between artists and the audience."

The festival, which runs from May 28 to June 17, provides a forum for artists from Canada, Europe, India, Indonesia, New Zealand and the United States to exchange, discover and discuss ideas on how they can collaborate with each other to further creative development.

Workshops, master classes and performances will be open to the public, providing audiences with the rare opportunity to catch a glimpse of the act of creation that is often concealed in a final production.

After 14 years of performing, teaching and collaborating abroad, Heppner said, she felt it was time to bring international and other Canadian artists to her home.

"I had been working with artists abroad, and after being in their home, they wanted to come visit me in mine. The festival is a way to bring them here," Heppner said.

"When you're in another country, the pressure to create something fast is extreme. We're constrained by time, money and also by culture and perspective, because the artists are working on a different frame of reference."

Heppner says she wanted counterparts from far away to come and create in a Canadian environment, from a perspective familiar to her and to other local artists.

"Toronto is my home. These are the streets I walk up and down every day, these are the artists in my circle. It was an obvious location for the pilot."

Born and raised in Montreal, Heppner began ballet lessons as a child. As a teenager, she took dance lessons with Elsie Solomons, who became her mentor.

"Elsie came from a tradition of modern dance and expressionism. She taught me that movement is not just about lines, shape and form, but that movement should express the human experience; that dance is a non-verbal expression of who we are and what we are feeling. This was crucial in my development, and my work ever since has been an extension of that."

Heppner says that being Jewish gave her a spiritual base upon which to develop her world view, and that her parents were also important influences in her life.

"My parents, Dodo and Lyone Heppner, have been leaders in the Jewish community in Montreal since I can remember," said Heppner, who recalls having people over at her house every Friday night for Shabbat dinner.

"My mom would play the piano, and I would sing and dance for our guests," Heppner said, adding that her siblings accompanied them.

"My parents taught me to have a sense of responsibility for the greater community, and to share things that are precious to me with others."

Toronto's foremost Yiddish diva to make New York debut

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Local actor-singer Theresa Tova, who has has become known over the past decade for her jazzy, emotional interpretations of classic Yiddish songs, has been invited to perform with several leading Yiddish divas at a June 24 outdoor concert in Damrosch Park beside New York's Lincoln Center.

Tova, whose first CD, Telling Stories, appeared last year, says the concert organizers invited her to participate soon after hearing the CD, which features about a dozen Yiddish tunes.

"I believe I'm the only Canadian on the bill," she says. "The idea is that the modern Yiddish divas are supposed to be honouring the real Yiddish divas from the great age of Yiddish music and vaudeville."

Born in Paris to Holocaust-survivor parents in the mid-1950s, Tova grew up in Calgary, and spoke Yiddish as her first tongue. After establishing her acting credentials with a few movie parts and a choice role on the 1990s TV series E.N.G., she ventured to sing publicly in her mameloshen, and audiences loved it.

"Yiddish touches my soul and enriches my life tremendously," she says. "It's in my blood, and I'm delighted to see it has universal appeal."

When it comes to singable Yiddish music, Tova is both an aficionado and an activist. Once, when asked to join a Christmas benefit show on CBC radio, hosted by Shelagh Rogers, she sang a snappy Yiddish version of Let It Snow, Let It Snow, Let It Snow after racking her brains in vain for a half-decent Chanukah song. "There are no good Chanukah tunes," she laments.

Tova has hardly stood still since her two-woman musical Still the Night, which dramatized her mother's Holocaust experiences, won four Dora awards and was nominated for a Governor General's Award. To her amazement, the printed version of the play has gone into a second printing.

Actor-singer Theresa Tova

"That's incredible for a play! Who buys plays?"

And she hints that the work is in development "for another medium."

Tova toured the United States with the Broadway production of Livent's Ragtime, playing the brassy Jewish anarchist Emma Goldman (which she performed before then-president Bill Clinton).

At last year's Stratford Festival, she took on another Jewish role – that of Yenta, in Fiddler on the Roof – alternating it with the part of Lady Jane in Gilbert and Sullivan's Patience.

Soon after she returns from New York, she's booked to sing Yiddish and jazz numbers at the Top of the Senator in Toronto on July 7 and 8. She's also booked at Stratford's Church Restaurant on July 28 (for an evening of Irving Berlin tunes), and at the Montreal Yiddish Festival on Aug. 16.

Nunsense closes Encore's season

By JOYCE SINGER-D'APRILE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Merle Garbe is the heart and soul of Encore Entertainment.

The non-profit community theatre company, which Garbe founded five years ago, has produced such crowd-pleasers as Beau Jest, The Fantastics, Anne of Green Gables and Fiddler on the Roof.

Their 2000-2001 season just ended with Nunsense, a farcical musical about an imaginary order of nuns. The book, music and lyrics are by Dan Goggin, direction is by Mario D'Alimonte and choreography is by D'Alimonte and Shari Robinson-Coulter.

In addition to Garbe, the show's producer, two of the musical's actresses, Liz Best (Sister Mary Robert Anne) and Bonnie Gold (Sister Mary Hubert), are also Jewish.

I figured it would be appropriate if I invited my Catholic friend Ellen to accompany me to the show. She told me, through tears of laughter, that the nuns who had taught her at Niagara Falls' Loretto Academy were never this much fun. She couldn't imagine the "ladies of Loretto" ever being as "jolly" as the Little Sisters of Hoboken!

At the start of this uproarious comedy, we learn that the cook has unintentionally poisoned most of the nuns at The Order of the Little Sisters of Hoboken, and that it was up to the handful that were left to raise enough money to bury them all. If only the mother superior hadn't purchased a fancy CD player – then they would have had enough money left in the fund.

Out of desperation, they decide to hold a variety show to raise the money. That's where all the zany shtick comes into play. The nuns continuously mingle with the audience, giving the feel of a real fund-raising event, with oodles of risqué humour coming from the madcap sisters and their irreverent reverend mother. No wonder their motto is that Nunsense is "habit forming"!

"My late father, Jerry Simmons, was very involved in Temple Sinai's Stage 210 group, about 30 years ago," she says. "He loved to perform and sing. He was a ham. He got me into a production of Guys and Dolls there in 1971. So I did a few shows with them. But then I didn't do anything in the theatre for a very long time.

"My dad was actually one of the founders of the Mel Lastman Variety Players in North York. They are a seniors group who go around putting on shows at Baycrest and other senior facilities."

Garbe's commitment to community theatre began in 1993 when she wrote and produced a musical review called Love and Other Stresses, which was performed in 1995 at the Ramada Dinner Theatre, where Encore Entertainment was born.

"Dinner theatre was fun, but it was too much organization," she says. "We really wanted to focus on theatre, rather than getting into the other aspects of it. So a year or so later my daughter Lea produced and directed You're a Good Man Charlie Brown at the little Solar Stage theatre.

"When the Vaughan City Playhouse was built, we [produced] The Diary of Anne Frank. We started our subscription series there," she says.

"In the fall of 1999, we moved to the Toronto Centre for the Arts, where the attendance has been better. We have a larger talent pool to draw from, not just for the performers, but with the designers and directors, etc., as well."

Watch for the 2001-2002 season's lineup, which will feature On Golden Pond, Les Belles Soeurs and Neil Simon's The Prisoner of Second Avenue.

Heppner took this idea of contributing to the good of the greater community with her when she moved to Toronto in 1973 to attend York University. After earning an honours BA in dance therapy and composition, Heppner began teaching at the Koffler Dance Studio, and established a production company with some of her university classmates. She also founded the dance department at Claude Watson High School for the Performing Arts.

Heppner began her company, Across Oceans, which focuses on collaboration in contemporary art , about seven years ago, and acts as its director.

Just as her career thus far has been intense, this next year promises to be no exception.

Heppner's goals include making the At Home Festival an annual event, establishing a centre for international collaboration in Toronto, which would house a library of audios and written documents for study and exchange of information.

She will be teaching in Athens for five weeks this summer, and she is then travelling to Singapore to create a new performance for a festival in September.

"The biggest difficulty for any performing artist is surviving – physically, emotionally and economically – because it's an engaging, demanding career," says Heppner. "But the belief that my work [sharing, creating and collaborating] is an important endeavour keeps me going."

Learning art gives kids confidence

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

Maya Vinokurov, artist and art teacher, says seeing her students' work on display at the second annual Antibes Art Exhibition, held recently at the Antibes community centre, makes her very proud.

"I'm very happy for them," she said as she welcomed visitors into the display room.

Though she has been an artist for decades, Vinokurov began teaching out of her own studio, called Art Studio 2000, and with North York Parks and Recreation three years ago after a neighbour asked Vinokurov to teach her how to paint with watercolour.

Now Vinokurov has over 60 students ages six and up and teaches every medium from sketching and pastels to oil and acrylic.

While Vinokurov says many of her students take art lessons to gain confidence in their abilities, to develop a hobby, or just to relax, some of her students are particularly talented.

My Hoang has been working on her portfolio with Vinokurov for five months and will be taking Design Foundation at Humber College.

"It's relaxing," Hoang says of taking art classes. "You get to apply your creativity and see it all come together. It takes your mind off everything else."

Laura Diaz is Vinokurov's most talented student. With Vinokurov's help she was able to put together a portfolio that got her accepted to Sheridan College's Art Fundamentals, one of Canada's foremost art programs.

"I've been drawing since I was little," says Diaz, whose family turned out to see some of her oil and acrylic paintings on display.

"Maya is a terriffic teacher. She helped me put together a portfolio and prepare for my interviews. She gave me pointers on how to improve my technique, and she helped me develop my own style," which Diaz describes as "realistic."

"I don't think any other person could have prepared me in such a short time. And I never thought I'd be good enough to get into Sheridan, which was my first choice, but Maya always believed in me."

Vinokurov was born in Latvia and lived in Israel before moving to Toronto in 1970. She studied graphic art at George Brown College, and says she mainly uses oil paint and works in the art deco style.

Some of her work has been bought for private collections, and before she began teaching she says she was always busy producing work for exhibits. Vinokurov says she has become so preoccupied with her students in the last year that she has not had enough time to complete enough pieces to display at art shows this year.

Bal Harbour resort a great getaway spot

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

The luxurious Sheraton Bal Harbour Beach Resort in Florida is a great getaway destination, catering to families and even those requiring kosher food.

This spacious 10-acre beachfront resort overlooking the Atlantic Ocean was the setting for the 1999 film Analyze This, starring Billy Crystal and Robert De Niro . The Sheraton Bal Harbour Beach Resort is located approximately 30-40 minutes from both the Miami and Fort Lauderdale airports.

Sheraton ITT purchased the property, formerly known as the Americana Hotel, in 1989. Now part of Starwood Hotels & Resorts Worldwide, the 642-room resort underwent a $60-million (US) renovation, and boasts of a $12-million water fantasy pool considered one of the 10 best swimming locales by American Airlines.

There are 26 garden villas with walkout terraces surrounding the pool area, perfect for families wanting a quick dip in the pool. The penthouse level and the presidential suites – where former president Bill Clinton has stayed – offers butler service.

Kids from five through 12 years of age can check into the Harbour Kids Club while their parents work out at the Lifestyle & Fitness Club. There are a host of poolside activities offered daily, including an early morning stretch and beach run, a water aerobics class, a billiards tournament and live poolside entertainment provided by Jimmy Stowe and the Stowaways.

At the public beach, located across a boardwalk by the hotel, you can rent equipment for water activities from a private operator and have the charges billed directly to your room.

The spa attracts tourists and locals alike with its inviting and calm environment. The spa's extensive services include facials, aromatherapy, pedicures, manicures, massages and hairstyling.

This outdoor mall is a magnet for the rich and famous. On any given day, watch out for the who's who of shoppers, such as Oprah, Will Smith, and Elizabeth and Bob Dole, who reside in the village.

The Bal Harbour Shops house renowned merchants, including Escada, Maxmara, Bulgari, Tiffany & Co., Piaget, Giorgio Armani, Prada, Gianni Versace, and high end department stores, such as Saks Fifth Avenue and Neiman Marcus. The exotic mall's focal point is an artistic sculpture garden with reflective ponds and waterfalls.

Sights to see include the Jewish Museum of Florida

If you can pull yourself away from Bal Harbour's beach, spa or shops, there is lots to see in Miami. The trendy Art Deco district of South Beach is only seven miles away.

Sights to see in Miami include the Miami Museum of Science & Space Transit Planetarium, the Wolfsonian, and the Jewish Museum of Florida. Also popular is the Lincoln Theater, where internationally renowned conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts his New World Symphony, made up of young talents from all over the world including Canada.

At night, the Sheraton can arrange in-room babysitting for parents wanting to board an Island Queen Cruise, where they can dance the night away. The homes of Rosie O'Donnell, Sylvester Stallone and the late Al Capone can be seen while on the cruise.

The Sheraton enables their kosher guests to eat kosher foods by supplying the names of a number of good restaurants that will deliver food to the hotel.

With advance notice, the Sheraton hosts large family reunions and group get-togethers, and kosher food can be supplied for these as well.

The Florida Department of State offers a publication called the Florida Jewish Heritage Trail, which is available by calling 1-800-847-7278 or by visiting their Web site at www.flheritage.com/magazine/jht. The booklet is full of interesting facts about the Floridian Jewish history.

For more information contact the Sheraton Bal Harbour Beach Resort at 305-865-7511 or go on the Web at www.balharbourflorida.com.

Last month, I addressed a question from John, whose mother died last November. Since then, John's father has lost interest in many activities, especially his passion for the stock market; he is not caring for his own personal needs or the cleanliness of his home; and he has been missing medical appointments. John felt that his father is still grieving but is denying this. Today, I continue to respond with some other suggestions.

Dear John,

As I concluded earlier, a comprehensive assessment can help determine the reasons for your father's presentation and develop a plan. Grief and depression may certainly have precipitated his decline; however, when difficulties extend to multiple areas of intellectual functioning, other diagnoses must also be considered.

A spouse will often unwittingly compensate for her partner's deficits, and when she dies, his memory dies with her. It is important to clarify whether your father is missing appointments because he does not care or because he forgets having made them in the first place. His excuses may represent sincere attempts to try and make sense of the confusion he feels – not deliberate attempts to manipulate or hide the truth from you.

Similarly, his lack of interest in following the stock market may underlie a more pervasive apathy and loss of skills in this area. While depression may explain some of his symptoms, a diagnosis of dementia must also be considered. The two often coexist, and both may respond to treatment.

Just as depression may mimic dementia, the reverse is also true. And just as antidepressant therapy may provide relief for the mood disorder, it may thereby, at least temporarily, relieve some of the associated memory disturbance. Close monitoring is critical to detect changes over time, to confirm the diagnosis, and to intervene accordingly.

There are many ways we can maximise the function and independence of our loved ones with dementia. In addition to home supports and recreational programs, medications are now available for treating mild to moderate Alzheimer's disease, and studies are ongoing to evaluate their efficacy in other dementia syndromes.

Drug therapy is also important in the treatment of stroke, which may also contribute to, and/or cause, dementia. By identifying and co-ordinating the necessary interventions, a comprehensive evaluation can help you and your father not feel so alone.

Dr. Shelley Veinish is a geriatrician at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and assistant professor in the faculty of medicine at the University of Toronto.

NEW Full On-Site Laboratory at Sunrise Location

JOURNEY FROM PAST TO PRESENT: Bialik Hebrew Day School, together with the Bernard Betel Centre, has been involved in an ongoing intergenerational project over the last five years. This year, students and seniors created a book titled Reflections on a Journey from the Past to the Present. Seen at the presentation of the book are, top row, from left, Beverley Young, Bialik senior division co-ordinator; Oved Ezouri; Evelyn Davis, program chair; Ruth Mapa, Bernard Betel Centre; Debra Danilewitz, Bialik school counsellor; and bottom row, Bialik students Daniel Newman, Adam Bercovici, Lisa Freedman and Leah Walters.

Short on Waiting. Long on Care.

The Community Care Centre at Branson Division

No one likes to wait hours in an emergency department. Now you have a quicker choice that still offers the quality of care you need. For urgent medical problems, the new Community Care Centre at Branson Division is a better choice.

We provide fast, efficient treatment of non-life-threatening problems such as:

- Allergic reactions and skin rashes
- Asthma, bronchitis and coughs
- Broken bones and sprains
- Cuts and scrapes
- Fevers, sore throats and colds
- Mental health problems
- Stomach pains

Call 911 for life-threatening conditions such as:

- Massive bleeding
- Choking
- Severe chest pains
- Shortness of breath

The doctors and nurses at the Community Care Centre at Branson Division are proud to be part of the Emergency Department of North York General Hospital, and are trained to handle any medical condition.

The Community Care Centre is supported on-site with excellent diagnostic equipment such as X-ray and laboratory services.

The Community Care Centre at Branson Division offers the best of both worlds. You get quicker access to a doctor for your urgent medical problems and the quality of care that you expect from North York General Hospital and emergency-trained doctors and nurses.

Remember, call 911 for life-threatening emergencies. For everything else, come to the Community Care Centre at Branson Division.

Open 8 am to 10 pm seven days a week.

Jordan Merkur: Directing Night Mother and Life After God at the same time

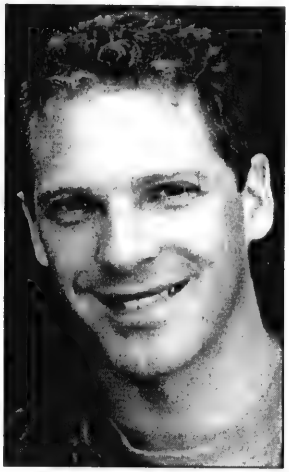
By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jewish theatre director Jordan Merkur, 39, is the first to direct two plays at the same time in the Fringe Festival (104 companies) July 5-15.

The festival plays run in six different locations in the Annex area, and two in the downtown core.

Merkur is directing a 90-minute production by Eclectic Theatre of Night Mother by Marsha Norman, another first for the Fringe which usually restricts plays to a 60-minute limit, and Life After God, a world premiere of an adaptation by his company and TBH Theatre of a Douglas Coupland short story by Jewish Toronto playwright and performer David Chaim Eden.



Jordan Merkur

Coupland is the Canadian author of Generation X – an expression which has become a fixture of our language.

Both plays will open July 6 at Tarragon Theatre, Night Mother on the Extra Stage and Life After God on the mainstage. (Call the Fringe hotline, 416 966-1062.)

Life After God, which is Eden's first venture here, is a one-man show about an ordinary man comparing his life choices to those of other people.

"We all wish at one time or another that we had made other choices," he says in the play in which he plays a total of nine characters.

The Fringe production of Life After God will go on to other fringe festivals in Winnipeg, Saskatoon and Edmonton before the summer is over, and Merkur will join it in Vancouver, which is Coupland's home city.

Merkur has been in professional theatre for 21 years, since he graduated from the fine arts program at York University in 1985, when his company, Eclectic Theatre, was born.

"It hasn't been easy, but I've been pretty lucky, with teaching and coaching jobs to help my income, and as a waiter for a very good caterer," he said.

Among those he's coached is comedian David Broadfoot.

Merkur is best known in the theatre world for Assassins, the story of six men who tried to kill U.S. presidents, which won five Dora awards, and Passion, the glitzy Stephen Sondheim musical.

"You either like Sondheim or you hate him," Merkur said.

Perhaps in the Jewish community he is best remembered for directing the original Chutzpah a go go, based on tales of Jews in western Canada, which has had a total of 10 productions, seven in Toronto, and one each in Winnipeg, Montreal and New York.

"I'd love to direct Chutzpah 2, and I'm encouraging writers and stars David Gale and Randy Vancourt to do it, but they're very busy."

The Toronto director has been attracted to social issue plays, such as Creeps, Bent, Fortune and Men's Eyes, Walking the Dead and My Mother Said I never Should. "I have always felt that theatre should have a voice in making the world a better place," he said. "But there is a resonance in these plays of something more subtle."

For example, in Creeps and Fortune and Men's Eyes, there are characters triumphing over adversaries. In Walking the Dead, sex change is the central issue, but we learn that though people may change their behaviour, they don't change their core personality.

My Mother Said I Never Should, which is set in Liverpool, is about four generations of women, but "Canadians identified with it through their own moms," he said.

At Leah Posluns Theatre, Merkur directed Bitter Memories in 1991, about American spy Jonathan Pollard, who is still in a U.S. jail, a play based on Pollard's assumptions coming true.

"There was great tension in the theatre that night because it was Jan. 17, the same night the Gulf War began."

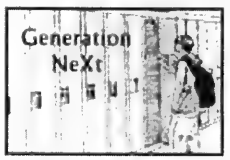
Greater Toronto Area

The Jewish freshman – part 2

By GILA ASHTOR

We are small but we are many
We are young but we unite,
To the candle of continuity
You are the flame, and we're the light

If the world of media, with its talk shows and heated debates, has taught us anything about ourselves, it is perhaps that to argue is to answer what simple questioning will not. Although the forum for finding ourselves may seen limited to the self-help bookshelves at Indigo, the quest to identify our academic careers and our relationship to our spiritual missions is within our reach, even closer than the nearest bookstore.



Having prefaced my last column with an introduction on the adolescent search for a spiritual curriculum, it seems almost fitting to recount a discussion recently held between a student and a teacher of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) at last week's graduation trip to Washington. Arguing the many ways students should strive to maintain their Jewishness, Shauna Hencowitz, an OAC student, was quick to claim that we must go where Jews go; that any other destination is a threat to an identity we cannot afford to endanger. Claiming that the best way to stay Jewish is to stay with Jews was how Shauna promised to nurture the spirit she has worked so hard to build.

"I can't challenge my religion yet – it's too shaky, too fragile, too weak," she said, almost determined to secure her heritage in the only way she knows how.

A teacher of Tanach and rabbinics, Rabbi Shlomo Vilk, thought differently. "What good is your religion, if you cannot challenge it?" he argued. For Vilk, young people's search for meaning must first come at the expense of personal ambivalence, private analysis and internal debate. Until we fight for our identity, we cannot be sure what it is we're protecting. Vilk went even further to defend his position, by explaining the paradox of our collective plight: that people must be willing to fight with the world in order to taste inner peace, that people must challenge their values in order to enjoy their decisions.

In the words of Pirkei Avot, the wisdom of Our Sages, let us remind ourselves of one truth. "If we are not for ourselves, who will be for us? If we are only for ourselves, what does that make us? And if not now, then when?" As the year draws to a close, let us imagine that if we are to preserve our education, our process can endure no delays.

Whether we accept that our Jewish identity is safer in the comfort of our own familiar surroundings, or admit that only challenge can develop our spiritual growth, we must unite in the understanding that our time is limited and our resources will change.

As Rami Friedman of Vaughan Secondary School said, "The question is not whether we are moving on, but what we do with where we're moving." If we have discovered anything, let it be that the search for answers will not end until we have found more questions; that a Jewish identity is too special to quantify; and above all else, that Jewish youth have too much potential to forfeit a history we are constantly helping to shape. More than anything let us remember that it is never too late to learn or too early to teach, especially when our heritage is on the line. After all, the past has no mercy and the future has no patience. We must acquire wisdom from both and courage from each.

Teen gymnast takes top spot in tourney

NEIL BECKER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Sacrifice and hard work paid off for Jennifer Horowitz as the Thornhill teen captured the all-round title at the recent Provincial Gymnastic Championships.

Competing in a hockey rink before approximately 1,000 spectators, Horowitz relied on strong motivation and years of experience to withstand the immense pressures of the competition.

"This is my fifth year at the Academy of Sport and Fitness Club. Ever since I started, I just wanted to compete and win," she said.

A gifted athlete who trains 22 hours a week, Horowitz, 13, specializes in four events – parallel bars, vault, beam and floor exercise.

"My favorite is the beam because I'm good at it," Horowitz said.

Prior to participating in the provincial championships, Horowitz had to get by "three qualifiers. It spreads out into a year long process running from November until May," said co-coach Kim Thompson.

Despite her success, Horowitz, who also takes dance lessons (jazz and ballet) twice a week, has no desire to remain in this field in which she excels.

"I want to be a chef," was her reply, when asked if she would want to make gymnastics a career.

She first became fascinated with the sport as a three year-old, when she saw it demonstrated in a mall. Even at that early age, she knew that it was something that she wanted to try.

A couple of years later, she got her wish; it was the beginning of the path that would bring her travel, tournaments and numerous medals.

"I have medals from the qualifiers and the Provincials. I've been to Washington, Chicago, New York and Florida," Horowitz said.

Competing abroad, with her head coach and club owner Paula Johnson, is also a way for Horowitz and other club athletes to broaden their knowledge; they are able to see and experience firsthand some of the sights that most people their age just learn about from schoolbooks.

The tournaments also foster longstanding friendships with athletes from other countries, friendships which are maintained thanks to the wonders of modern technology.

"They make friends and talk on the chat line or e-mail each other," Thompson said.

According to Thompson, Horowitz is a role model for the younger girls who are just starting at the gymnastics school.

Whenever she is practicing, some of the young ones stop what they're doing to watch and admire her talents.

"They sit there watching and are totally mesmerized," Thompson said.

Next year, Horowitz will move up to level three, an advancement in her craft that will naturally require more intensive training.

Johnson believes the sky is the limit for this gifted gymnast.

"She is talented enough. She has the skills. She can coach or judge if she wants to," she said.

Horowitz had been slated to compete this summer at the Maccabiah Games in Israel, but those plans were cancelled due to the security situation.

"I was on the team to go. I wanted to go and kind of didn't because of what was happening," she said.

For now, Horowitz is just happy to be training at The Academy Of Sports and Fitness. She is looking forward to next year's tournaments, including qualifying and defending in the Provincials.

Israel, Spain tie in key soccer qualifier

Ha'aretz Sports Staff

JERUSALEM — The Israeli national team played European giants Spain to a 1-1 tie in their Group 7 qualifying match for the 2002 World Cup last week. The tie gives Israel an all-important point in the struggle to qualify for next year's World Cup finals.

Israel is now in third place in the group behind Spain and Austria, with two games left to play. The team finishing first in the five-nation group qualifies automatically for the finals in Japan and South Korea. The second-placed team goes to a playoff for the coveted ticket.

In front of a meagre 25,000 fans at the national stadium in Ramat Gan, Israel got off to a dream start. With just four minutes on the clock, Eyal Berkovic powered his way into the Spanish penalty area and, with the outside of his foot, sent a perfect cross into the center for Haim Revivo. Revivo, with all the confidence of a player who has just lifted the league championship with Turkish team Fenerbahce, sent an acrobatic diving header past the Spanish goalkeeper to give the home team a shock lead.

Israel continued to dominate the game, with the visiting team looking distinctly second-best. After 20 minutes of play, the Spaniards woke up and created several excellent scoring opportunities. They were thwarted, however, by Israeli keeper Nir Davidovich, who made a string of heroic saves, denying Raul, Luis Enrique and Ruben Baraja.

Despite being pinned down for long periods, Israel managed to create several chances of its own, the best of which fell to Berkovic. His curving free-kick left Canizares totally at sea, but the ball hit the post.

Just before the half-time interval, Israel lost Davidovich, after a bizarre incident in which the keeper injured his knee and could not continue. Davidovich was replaced by Duda Awat, making his third appearance for Israel.

The second half was played at a much slower pace, as Spain attempted to find a way through to goal. Eventually, and almost inevitably, the Spaniards equalized, when Raul scored from close range in the 63rd minute.

Thereafter, both teams tired visibly. A series of tactical substitutions by both managers, bringing on midfielders in place of attackers, ensured that the result remained level at the final whistle, which was greeted with rapturous applause from a home crowd that clearly could not have expected Israel to get even a draw.

Despite the positive result, there was a restrained atmosphere in the Israeli camp after the game. On their way home, the players looked disappointed with the outcome, and there was a feeling they had missed a golden opportunity.

Berkovic said: "It's about time Israel – and Berkovic – were in the World Cup finals. This is a great chance for us. Personally I was pleased to have put on a good performance against one of the best teams in the world – but not the best. We have to learn from them about possession soccer."

Israel's coach, Richard Nielsen, sounded pleased with the result and the Israeli performance, but could not hide his disappointment as, once again, his charges had failed to keep a grip on a lead.

"I wanted to win very much. It's a great shame that we cannot win games after we take the lead, and after we also create so many chances to score. But I have to say one thing: the players deserve a lot of credit for deciding not to disappoint the Israeli people and the fans. I am sure the fans will be pleased, and will be able to smile despite the difficult period we are all going through."

Spain's coach Jose Antonio Camacho said his team's relaxed attitude at the start of the game was responsible for the result. "Israel took advantage of our poor start. They began strongly, and made the most of the first 10 minutes with a fine goal. After that we got back into the match and dominated," Camacho said. "After the first 10 minutes, there was only one team trying to play football, and that was us."

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

Cursed with the knack to see both sides of a story, I am of two minds when it comes to former U.S. President Bill Clinton's impending visit to Toronto to raise funds for a Holocaust monument. Clinton's profile will practically guarantee that the Wall of Remembrance will be built in Earl Bales Park, a worthwhile project if ever there was one, but at what moral cost?

The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, which is planning to build the black, polished granite walls to be engraved with the names of Holocaust victims, surely had good intentions when it invited Clinton. What a draw! A former president, no less; a friend of Israel on whose front lawn Yitzhak Rabin and Yasser Arafat shook hands (with disastrous results, but that's another story); a successful, two-term leader under whose stewardship the economy roared, crime dropped and there was a chicken in every pot. And a charismatic guy to boot.

Who wouldn't want to go hear him? A lot of people, as it turns out. While ticket prices are reasonable (between $150 and $250 each), the June 25 event at the Hummingbird Centre isn't even close to sold out. As of this writing, the 3,000 or so tickets were between one-half and three-quarters sold. (A corporate dinner beforehand, however, is sold out.)

So maybe Clinton isn't that big a draw. Or maybe people realize he's the wrong person to speak about anything to do with the Holocaust.

For it was on his watch that the greatest mass murder since the Third Reich took place: the 1994 slaughter – in the span of just 100 days – of 800,000 Tutsi and moderate Hutus, women and children included, by Hutu extremists in Rwanda.

Early in his presidency, Clinton visited Yad Vashem and vowed, "Never again." Then he allowed the Rwanda massacre to proceed.

According to a summary of Rwanda: The Preventable Genocide, the report of an international panel that investigated the genocide, the United States had the unequalled influence within the United Nations to ensure the deployment of a military mission that could have prevented the nightmare before it began. Even after it started, the report states, a serious military mission "could dramatically have reduced the magnitude of the slaughter."

Why didn't Clinton act? It took a former (and Jewish) American Secretary of State to answer that a few years later, when U.S. forces joined NATO to bomb Serbia. The shortest answer, said Lawrence Eagleburger, was that Kosovars are white and European, and Rwandans are neither.

To be fair, blame for the Rwandan genocide went around. France, Belgium, the UN itself and the Roman Catholic Church were named in the report as equally blame-worthy.

I should disclose that prior to returning to The CJN in 1990, I was on the Yad Vashem committee that built the current Holocaust monument in Earl Bales Park, and happily, my and my wife's names are on it. Looking back, though, we had no splashy big names to help us. The money was raised through sheer, old-fashioned sweat: parlour meetings, solicitations and effective publicity.

Clinton's appearance is all the more ironic given recent close ties between local Rwandans and Holocaust survivors, who have met to explore ways to cope with their respective traumas.

There's something else, too. Clinton is a liar of epic proportions and, perhaps most disturbingly, a sexual predator of women half his age. Let's not forget he was impeached for his mendacity and tomcat-like morals. On his way out, he pardoned his criminal supporters.

The Wall of Remembrance should be built. But the memory of the Six Million should not be sullied this way.

About Parenting

Rebecca Katz

How do you find a pediatrician or family physician for your children, one who suits your needs and shares your philosophy on child rearing?

Well, if you are anything like me, you stick with the pediatrician who has addressed your health concerns since birth.

Or you may be one of those lucky people who find a great doctor through word of mouth or professional referral, and discover that his or her parenting philosophy and personality clicks with your ideals.

But, if you do not fall into either of these categories, an effective solution may be to interview some doctors in the last few months before your baby arrives. My pediatrician, Dr. Robert Farber, offers some questions you may wish to ask potential prospects.

Farber suggests inquiring about the doctor's philosophy on breast feeding. As well, are there specific circumstances under which a patient should call the office? Is there a special time for phone calls? What happens when the doctor is away? What are the doctor's hours? What should the patient do in an emergency? What is the doctor's routine when the mother is in hospital recovering after delivering the newborn? What can you expect from the doctor in the first few weeks after the birth of the baby?

When they do an interview, Farber suggests that the parents consider whether they would be compatible with the doctor and whether the doctor takes time to explain things. As well, he suggests being cognizant of how the receptionists relate to you and how easy it is to get an appointment.

In addition to Farber's questions, I would inquire about the number of patients the doctor schedules on an average day and if there is a long wait in the reception area. Does the doctor have special times allotted to see sick patients separately from newborns and those who are there for routine check-ups? Which hospitals is the doctor affiliated with? Will the doctor make house calls? Is the doctor familiar with any health concerns that may be common among children of Jewish background?

In addition, you have to give your relationship some time to grow.

"You've got to know them," Farber says. "You've got to experience what it is like when you go to the office. Pediatricians tend to be different with different patients, and you act differently in different situations."

That does not mean a doctor will choose favourites. The time a patient spends developing a relationship with a physician may help the doctor care for your needs more effectively.

So don't be shy. Get your list of questions ready and arrange some interviews before the baby arrives. Many doctors would welcome the opportunity to acquaint you with their practice.

MOUNT SINAI HOSPITAL

The Best Medicine

June, 2001

YOUR HOSPITAL, YOUR NEWS

The smells of warm, kosher food now at Mount Sinai Hospital.

In search for a delicious, warm kosher lunch in the downtown core? Search no further than Mount Sinai Hospital's specialty kosher food section in its Cafeteria on the second floor.

"We decided to take a mini-Marché approach and offer hot, ready made and freshly prepared kosher meal options in our Cafeteria," said the hospital's Director of Nutrition and Food Services, Joy Langlois. "The service was developed in response to inquiries from hospital staff, volunteers and patient family members for hot kosher lunches."

"We are proud to offer this service," said Mount Sinai Hospital's President and Chief Executive Officer Joseph Mapa. "It has special meaning because of our roots and our unabated commitment to the Jewish community."

Mount Sinai Hospital was founded by Toronto's Jewish community in 1923 as a non-denominational maternity and convalescent hospital that would provide treatment to all, in a setting that was culturally sensitive to the needs of the Jewish community, and operate as a training facility for young Jewish doctors. Today Mount Sinai Hospital is internationally recognized for its patient care, teaching and research.

The hospital's new kosher specialty food section is just one of only a handful of such eateries in the downtown core. Prior to opening the specialty food line, the hospital offered convenient prepackaged kosher meals produced by outside suppliers, and offered occasional theme days with warm food items such as pizza or soup.

The new kosher menu includes cabbage borsch soup, blintzes, vegetarian lasagna and sushi. A variety of salads and sandwiches are also available on a daily basis.

The hot kosher food section is open from 11 a.m. - 2 p.m.

MOUNT SINAI HOSPITAL CONTINUOUSLY STRIVING TO BE THE BEST

LETTER TO THE COMMUNITY

Mount Sinai Hospital is dedicated to identifying and delivering the highest level of patient care, teaching and research. Our goal is to be one of the pre-eminent hospitals in the world providing The Best Medicine!

We have made great strides towards achieving our objective and we would not be where we are today without your support. Thanks to you, The Best Medicine campaign has now passed the $150 million mark and continues to be the most successful health care fund raising campaign in Canada. Your contribution has made a huge difference to our hospital and the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute. It has been a source of encouragement for everyone involved at the hospital and has re-energized and refocused our efforts for our patients and the community.

We are pleased to report that under the leadership of new President and Chief Executive Officer Joseph Mapa, the hospital's vision has been renewed through the development of a comprehensive plan that builds on our strengths and guides our direction for the future. Innovative and forward-looking proposals from hospital Chiefs and Senior Staff that consider future trends in healthcare while building on Mount Sinai's centres of excellence have been incorporated in this new vision. By integrating specific goals and objectives with the day-to-day programmatic and operational workings of the hospital, the Strategic Planning Committee has developed a strategic plan that is a flexible blueprint for the future.

We are also pleased to report that a number of projects, made possible by The Best Medicine campaign, are now in place or nearing completion. These include: the world class Kimel Family Medical Resonance Imaging Centre that has two new MRI units; the newly renovated Schwartz/Reisman Emergency Centre that will make our Emergency Services more responsive, state-of-the-art and patient friendly; and the Lawrence and Frances Bloomberg Department of Obstetrics and Gynaecology that offers one of the most comprehensive range of patient care services, teaching and research in North America.

I would also like to tell you about a number of other wonderful new projects that the hospital is undertaking as a result of the generosity of individuals, corporations, and foundations and which form an integral part of our strategic plan.

- We recently purchased a building on the corner of Murray and Orde Streets, behind the hospital, giving us approximately 130,000 square feet of usable space for the expansion of our patient care and research activities. Three of the programs moving into the new building are: The Ellen and Martin Prosserman and Family Centre for Health Research, the Koffler Urological Centre and the Leadership Sinai Centre for Diabetes. In addition, we have also expanded to the Ontario Power Generation building at 700 University Avenue where the Obstetrics and Gynaecology outpatient or ambulatory programs are now located.
- Plans are underway to begin construction of two exciting new projects funded by the Prosserman Family Foundation. We will establish the Ellen and Martin Prosserman and Family Centre for Health Research, part of the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute, to carry out research that will combine biology with modern technology to unlock the secrets of genetics and its relationship to the spread of disease. We will also establish the Anna Prosserman Heart Clinic that will enable us to double the number of patients we treat with congestive heart failure to more than 3,000 visits a year.
- We are also planning to build a unique centre called the Koffler Urological Centre that will focus on prostate cancer, general urology, infertility, sexual dysfunction, andrology and research into the genetics of urological diseases.
- We opened the Freeman Centre for Endocrine Oncology, a collaborative venture between Mount Sinai Hospital and St. Michael's Hospital. Located at Mount Sinai, this centre is the only one of its kind in Canada. It brings together two distinct disciplines – oncology (the study of tumours) and endocrinology (the study of endocrine glands and hormones) to focus on tumours of the pituitary, thyroid, parathyroid and adrenal glands.
- We established The Peter A. Silverman Centre for International Health. The Centre's mission is to enrich academic medicine and health in Canada and internationally through activities in research, exchange program and services.
- As well, Leadership Sinai has launched an ambitious $3.5 million campaign to establish a Leadership Sinai Chair in Surgery and the Leadership Sinai Advanced Surgical Technology Centre. This campaign will support medical leadership and make the Department of Surgery one of the Canadian pioneers in using new robotic and computerized surgical systems for patient care, teaching and research. Through this advanced technology, surgeons at Mount Sinai will be able to participate in surgical procedures at any hospital in the world that has equivalent equipment.

Today, Mount Sinai is in a strong position to serve patients and the community and we have great plans for the future. In order to achieve these goals, there is a lot of work we need to complete. For example:

- Renovations are required on several floors to upgrade patient care areas to ensure a consistent standard of excellence throughout the hospital.
- Funds are needed to support the purchase of the Murray/Orde Street building and renovations that will be required to convert it into a world-class clinical and health research pavilion.
- Increased support for equipment and technology is needed in many areas of the hospital, including our Intensive Care Unit (ICU) where patients require a technology rich, controlled environment. To support the care of these patients, the ICU would like to establish a Technology Application Unit that will allow physicians to access vital patient information and treatment procedures rapidly. This will result in improved patient care and enhanced decision making at reduced costs.
- More program support for the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute is essential to its ongoing success and research activities. To support its efforts in the areas of genetics and research that translates work carried out in the lab to patient care treatment, it needs new labs, expanded facilities and funding for research chairs.

Most important, we need to increase the number of unrestricted donations to the hospital. These gifts give the hospital the greatest flexibility and enable it and the Research Institute to accommodate priority needs as they arise.

Your support has never been more important than at the present time. Hospitals are experiencing increased demands for their services. At the same time, the provincial government is making it very clear that increases to health care spending must be brought under control. It is looking to the private sector and communities to help ease the financial crunch hospitals are experiencing.

In light of these ongoing needs, it is obvious that The Best Medicine fund raising efforts must continue. In order to meet the objectives laid out in our strategic plan, we must raise $60 million over the short term, followed by an additional $90 million over the next six years, and we need to expand our endowment fund by at least $100 million. In total, we hope to have The Best Medicine campaign reach the $400 million level by the year 2007. At the same time that we are looking to our community for continued support, we are also working in partnership with the government and exploring all possible avenues for additional operating funds. It is a partnership that has worked well as both of us look for ways to enhance health care services to the people of Toronto and Ontario.

We are grateful for your contributions and would welcome any additional help you can provide, both personally and by encouraging others to support The Best Medicine campaign. Your generosity through The Best Medicine campaign is enabling the hospital to continue to grow as a leader in the health care field and to provide better care to its patients, many of whom may be your family members, your friends or your colleagues.

Mount Sinai Hospital is dedicated to identifying and delivering the best patient care with the heart and values true to our heritage. In other words, The Best Medicine. Together, let's make sure we provide the Hospital with the resources it needs to achieve that promise.

Sincerely

Lawrence Bloomberg

UJA FEDERATION

No one gift changes more lives.

Each year, we recognize and salute the exceptional women and men whose commitment to volunteering enhances the well being of our community. These dedicated individuals representing our richly diverse community demonstrate how much we can achieve when we work together.

This year being the "International Year of Volunteers," we are proud to join millions around the world in celebrating the spirit of voluntarism and in paying tribute to our own special volunteers.

This year also marks a new era of Jewish communal cooperation and partnership as hundreds of volunteers from all walks of life come together, under the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow umbrella, to plan for an even brighter tomorrow. Their hard work and enthusiasm are helping to make the dreams of an entire community come true.

On behalf of UJA FEDERATION, I want to express our appreciation for your dedicated service and your commitment to community.

Voluntarism Vibrant in Jewish Community

by Helen Finder-Guttman
Chair, Community Development
UJA FEDERATION

The annual Volunteer Supplement – a tribute to our selfless volunteers and the organizations they are so dedicated to – is an eagerly anticipated feature of UJA FEDERATION.

This year's supplement is like no other. More volunteers and organizations appear on these pages than ever before – more than 70 in all! We should be exceptionally proud of the achievements and commitment of these community builders.

In this "International Year of Volunteers" – a global initiative to ignite the spirit of voluntarism – the following pages reveal that voluntarism is already thriving in our community. We must not, however, assume that our community's volunteer needs have been met. There are numerous volunteer opportunities available today. Organizations large and small are in desperate need of your help. Regardless of your time commitment or volunteering interests THERE IS A PLACE FOR YOU!

To those who are recognized on these pages – and to the many volunteers who are not – thank you. Your dedication and commitment serves as a catalyst for action and an inspiration to us all.

May you go from chayil el chayil – from strength to strength.

Building Community - One by One

Recently we read the longest parsha of the entire year, parshat Nasso. Nearly half of this parsha consists of the same six verses repeated twelve times, with an additional five versus summarizing the previous seventy-two. These repeated verses describe the identical offerings that the leaders of each tribe brought to dedicate the tabernacle, followed by a calculation of the total amount of offerings brought by all twelve leaders. But why the repetition? Would it not suffice to record the leaders' offerings just once? The only difference between each of the twelve repetitions is the name of the leader bringing the offering.

But, this is precisely the point: the offerings were not really identical. Each offering was unique and bore the distinct mark of the person who offered it. The Torah is teaching us that every individual had something unique to offer. But still, why does the Torah find it necessary to calculate the total of all the offerings brought by the twelve leaders? Although it is important to realize what we can offer as individuals, it is equally important to realize that our role is part of a bigger picture.

As members of Klal Israel, each of us has something unique to offer. When we all understand this, our actions take on a fuller meaning, and only then do we truly become a community.

2001 International Year of Volunteers

Toronto Joins International Year of Volunteers

This year, Toronto's Jewish community joins millions around the world in a sweeping salute to volunteers.

Canada, along with more than 120 other nations including Israel, are participating in year-long celebrations resulting from the United Nations General Assembly declaration of 2001 as the "International Year of Volunteers."

"Each year we recognize the achievements of our volunteers and their value to the community," notes Helen Finder-Guttman, Chair of Community Development at UJA FEDERATION. "We welcome the opportunity to proudly add our voice to other organizations and communities around the world in applauding the hard work and commitment of our volunteers in this special year."

UJA FEDERATION - Volunteer Driven

Volunteers are the lifeblood of any organization. Perhaps nowhere is that truer than at UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto.

There are more than 1,000 individuals who give of themselves, day in and day out, throughout a typical UJA FEDERATION Annual Campaign. Whether it's the 500-600 people who canvas in person or over the telephone, or the other 400-500 who participate in telethons and various committees, these hard-working, selfless people come from an eclectic array of backgrounds – both professionally and politically. They are young and old, male and female – all galvanized by one common goal: helping Jews in Toronto and around the world through UJA FEDERATION.

"Quite simply, UJA FEDERATION has the impressive track record it does due to our volunteers," asserts Lisa Morrison, Campaign Director.

"We are able to accomplish what we do because of not only the incredible quantity of individuals who give of themselves every year but, more importantly, because of their quality and commitment. Our volunteers have such an innate and deep understanding of Jewish needs. I am constantly moved by their level of care towards Jews all over the world."

"UJA FEDERATION is indeed incredibly fortunate that we attract such a wonderful assortment of hard-working, caring individuals year after year. They are truly a source of inspiration and pride that never ceases to amaze me," concludes Morrison.

JTT Values Volunteers

Jewish TORONTO Tomorrow

JEWISH TORONTO TOMORROW is all about new philanthropy, new partnerships and new services, but its ultimate success depends on one thing that's not so new. People.

"The success of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow to date has been the depth and breadth of the volunteers coming forth to be a part of this unprecedented initiative," says Leslie Gales, who is co-chairing the JTT Steering Committee with Barry Sherman. "The scale and scope of this endeavour may be different from anything this community has ever seen, but its most essential component remains the people who believe in its goals," adds Gales.

Since its official launch last spring, hundreds of community members have become involved in numerous JTT projects through financial contributions, consultations and planning committees focusing on three campuses for Jewish life – downtown, central and York Region.

In the heart of old Jewish Toronto, community members are rallying behind an initiative to renovate and expand the Bloor Jewish Community Centre as well as build a new centre for Jewish students attending the University of Toronto. Further north along Bathurst Street, volunteers are planning the revitalization of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and its surrounding complex, while residents of York Region are laying the groundwork for the largest, multi-purpose community complex ever built in North America.

"I feel very fortunate to be a part of such an exciting venture," says Les Mendelbaum, who is active in the revitalization of the Bloor Jewish Community Centre, as part of JTT's downtown initiative. "Being exposed to so many other interesting people committed to the same cause has enriched my life while giving me the opportunity to fulfil my obligation to my community," he adds.

Leo Goldhar, Chair of JTT's York Region Steering Committee says he is "honoured to be a part of a dedicated team of knowledgeable and caring members of the community who are working on a 'world class' Jewish development. These exceptional volunteers share a large vision and an expansive dream, and bring a wide range of expertise from the development, financial, cultural, academic, communal, educational and recreational worlds."

"Nothing happens without volunteers," maintains Peter Cohen, Chair of JTT's Central Campus Development Committee. "Whether it's time, money or talent, everyone has something to offer."

CHAT Cultivates Community Service

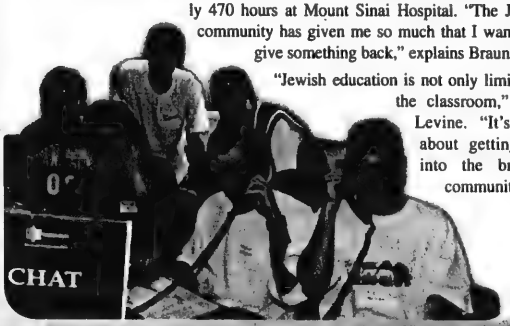
Despite busy schedules and heavy workloads, Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) students are spending more hours volunteering than ever before.

More than 1,200 CHAT students have performed over 22,000 hours of volunteer service annually at more than 150 organizations throughout the GTA since its Community Service Program was established five years ago. Program founder Gary Levine says the goal of the initiative is to teach Jewish youth about the importance of community involvement and helping those in need.

Although the program is compulsory for students in grades 9 through 12, many perform more than the required 18 hours of service, reports Janine Pokroy, Program Coordinator at the school's Wilmington Campus. "Each year the number of volunteer hours grows," says Pokroy.

That's because of students like 17 year-old Lior Braunstein, who racked up nearly 470 hours at Mount Sinai Hospital. "The Jewish community has given me so much that I wanted to give something back," explains Braunstein.

"Jewish education is not only limited to the classroom," adds Levine. "It's also about getting out into the broader community."



Volunteers Aid Survivors

The painfully difficult task of applying for compensation from the German government and German companies for survivors who served as slave labourers during the Holocaust was made a little easier thanks to a very special group of volunteers.

Over the last three months, a corps of 18 volunteers, trained by UJA FEDERATION's Jewish Information Service, ran clinics to help 600 survivors living in the Greater Toronto Area fill out the cómplicated and often confusing claim forms that may entitle them to financial compensation. An additional 2,500 applicants were helped by phone.

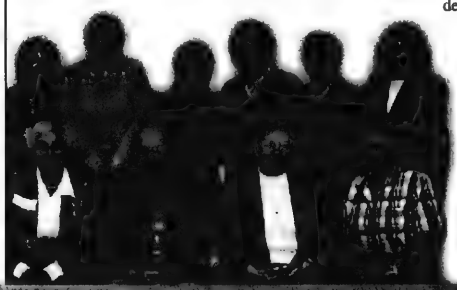
According to Barbara Barak, Senior Coordinator at JIS, an estimated 7,000 to 8,000 Holocaust survivors live in Toronto, and many who qualify for slave labour compensation have yet to come forward.

Volunteers described the sessions as "highly emotional."

"The stories these people came in with were just incredible," recalls Ruth Telesnik. "I feel honoured to have been a part of helping these wonderful people."

"We were so blessed to work with these wonderful, dedicated, caring individuals," adds Barak.

"It was our volunteers who made these clinics such a tremendous success."



A TRIBUTE

It is with great pleasure and pride that I welcome you to the seventh annual Salute to our Community Volunteers. The men and women featured in these pages, representing all ages and backgrounds, share a deep commitment to perpetuating Jewish values through voluntarism. Their hard work and enthusiasm contribute to making our community the best it can be and inspire others to become involved in community service.

I applaud all of you who give of yourselves in order to help those in need and improve the quality of life for us all. In this special "International Year of Volunteers," I invite you to discover how meaningful and rewarding volunteering can be.

VOLUNTEER RECOGNITION AWARDS on behalf

2001 SADOWSKI AWARD

The Ben Sadowski Award recognizes individuals with long standing records of senior community service with UJA FEDERATION and the larger Jewish community. It is this community's most prestigious volunteer recognition award.

RONALD APPLEBY Q.C.

For more than three decades, Ronnie's expertise, commitment and leadership have benefited a broad range of community organizations. His involvement with UJA FEDERATION includes serving as President from 1985-1987, Chair of the Lawyers Division and Vice Chair of Major Gifts. Ronnie is currently a Life Member of UJA FEDERATION's Board of Directors and a member of the Board of Trustees of The Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto. His other leadership roles include Vice President of United Israel Appeal (1989-1990), Chairmanship of the 1983 and1994 JNF Negev Award Dinners and the upcoming Canadian Friends of Hebrew University Dinner, Vice President and Director of the Canadian Friends of the Shalom Hartman Institute, membership on the Board of Governors of Mount Sinai Hospital and Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, as well as the Board of Directors of Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science and the Haifa Foundation.

"For 30 years, community involvement and leadership have added a significant dimension to my life. It is my way of nurturing my Jewish soul and strongly identifying as part of the Jewish people in Canada, in Israel, and with generations past and those to come."

GRANOVSKY AWARD FOR CAMPAIGN EXCELLENCE

Named after the late Jewish community leader Phil Granovsky, the award is a tribute to individuals who exemplify the best in UJA FEDERATION campaigning.

DEBBIE KIMEL

Debbie has been involved with the UJA FEDERATION annual campaign for almost 20 years. After participating along with husband Warren in a UJA FEDERATION Young Leadership Mission to Israel, Debbie began to volunteer extensively in Women's Campaign, during which time she graduated from the UJA FEDERATION's Leadership Development Program. In 1993/94 she served as Chair of the Women's Campaign and later as Chair of the Lion of Judah Division. More recently, Debbie served as Vice Chair of Campaign 2000, Co-chair of the 2001 telethons and currently chairs the UJA FEDERATION Lion of Judah Endowment.

"My volunteer work at UJA FEDERATION has allowed me to develop my leadership skills and links with the Jewish community. I appreciate the opportunities that I've had to meet and work with so many wonderful people over the last 20 years. I thank the Granovsky family and the community for recognizing me with this award."

LEADERSHIP DEVELOPMENT AWARDS

Leadership Development Awards were established to encourage young men and women to assume community leadership roles. The awards are presented to individuals who demonstrate extraordinary community commitment and service.

ALISON HIMEL

Alison became active in UJA FEDERATION as a way of re-connecting with the Jewish community after returning to Toronto from the United States seven years ago. Her involvement began as one of the founding members of ATID, a group of young leaders that Alison chaired in 1997 and 1998. Alison's deep commitment to UJA FEDERATION broadened through her work in the Women's Campaign & Advocacy executive, most specifically as Chair of Outreach. She is currently fulfilling her second year term as a member of UJA FEDERATION's Board of Directors.

"I consider myself very lucky to have the time to be involved with the community in such a meaningful and rewarding way. UJA FEDERATION welcomed me from day one and continues to make me feel very appreciated."

JUDITH FINER-FREEDMAN

It didn't take long for Judith to plug into UJA FEDERATION after she relocated to Toronto from Houston, Texas ten years ago. In pursuing her passion for helping Jews in need wherever they are, Judith became active in UJA FEDERATION's Women's Professional Network and later went on to chair the campaign-wide Young Professionals Network. After serving as Chair of the highly successful Women's Campaign & Advocacy Pacesetters Division in 1999 and 2000, Judith is currently carrying out a two-year term as Chair of the prestigious Lion of Judah Division.

"UJA FEDERATION has always been a large and important part of my life. I feel lucky to be part of an organization and a community that is on the cutting edge of helping people in need."

EXCELLENCE

DAKAH and COMMUNITY INVOLVEMENT constant priorities in their lives. Their unrelenting COMMITMENT nity help enrich the lives of so many and instill enormous COMMUNITY PRIDE in us all. They will receive their of the entire community at UJA FEDERATION's upcoming Annual Meeting in September.

SHEM TOV AWARDS

The Shem Tov Awards are presented to leaders representing the highest levels of excellence in volunteer service in Toronto's Jewish community.

RALPH BERGER
JVS OF GREATER TORONTO

Following in his father's footsteps, Ralph has contributed his time, skill and expertise to JVS, serving as its Immediate Past President from 1998 – 2000 and, prior to that, on the Executive Committee. A skilled negotiator and IT expert, Ralph helped to enhance the profile and improve systems and operations at JVS.

"There is plenty of work that community organizations need doing. If I can help, I should; if I don't, why should I expect anyone else to?"

FAY GOLD
UJA FEDERATION

Since the Yom Kippur War, Fay has been the consummate UJA FEDERATION campaigner. While telethons are her specialty, having earned her numerous awards, Fay has also been active in UJA FEDERATION Women's Campaign & Advocacy and the Societies Division.

"Volunteering for UJA FEDERATION allows me to carry on my family's traditions of tzedakah and supporting Israel. It is my lifeblood."

STAN KUGELMASS
REENA

A staunch advocate for the developmentally challenged, Stan has dedicated himself to improving the lives of such individuals through his valuable work at Reena over the last six years. Serving as Chair of Reena from 1998-2000, Stan remains an active member of the Board of Directors.

"The greatest joy for me as a volunteer has been the opportunity to work and spend time with people of the highest quality. They unstintingly devote their time and energy to support the needs of the community."

SUSAN MALDOFF
JEWISH FAMILY & CHILD SERVICE

A social worker by profession, Susan has provided leadership and strong commitment to JF&CS throughout her 15 years as a volunteer with the organization. She is currently President and has served as Chair of the Family & Community Services Committee and the Child and Youth Services Committee, as well as the 1992 Friends Campaign.

"Community involvement has always played an important role in my life. My volunteer experience with JF&CS has been most satisfying. The reward for volunteering is knowing that the work done by this agency improves the quality of life for individuals in Toronto."

LIONEL ROBINS
BERNARD BETEL CENTRE FOR CREATIVE LIVING

A dedicated fundraiser and active member of the community, Lionel is on the Board of Directors of Bernard Betel Centre. In addition, he is Vice-Chair of the Board of Directors of Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation and sits on the Board of Governors of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and Mount Sinai Hospital.

"For me, volunteering has been an essential component to my having a balanced life. It has enabled me to share my interest, expertise and experience to help a most worthwhile agency serve the Jewish senior community. My association with the Betel Centre has truly been a most rewarding and fulfilling experience."

MARVIN SADOWSKI
BAYCREST CENTRE FOR GERIATRIC CARE

Marvin has dedicated nearly 30 years to ensuring the wellbeing of seniors through his work at Baycrest. Currently Chair of the Board of Directors, Marvin has also served as Chair of the Audit Committee and Co-Chair of the Building Committee, during which time he provided vital leadership and expertise to such projects as the new Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged and Two Neptune Drive.

"It is a great honour to receive the Shem Tov Award during the 'International Year of Volunteers.' I accept it on behalf of all the wonderful volunteers who make Baycrest such a caring and unique organization."

DR. STEVEN SILVER
JEWISH CAMP COUNCIL OF TORONTO

A resident of Hamilton, Steven travels all the way to Toronto to carry out his volunteer work with the Jewish Camp Council. In addition to being an active Board member and serving on several committees, Steven's dedicated service has included being President, Vice-President and Treasurer.

"Volunteering in the Jewish Camp Council has given me the opportunity to give to the community in ways that a cheque cannot."

MICHAEL WEINRICH
JEWISH IMMIGRANT AID SERVICES

Michael's commitment to integrating newcomers into the Jewish community goes well beyond his volunteer work with JIAS. In addition to being a longstanding JIAS Board member, Michael has led by example by personally befriending dozens of immigrant families and helping them feel at home.

"To help others is the ultimate deed. Being a volunteer in JIAS, I have had the privilege of helping many Jewish families from the former Soviet Union. Immigration is a very painful and traumatic experience and brings with it many difficulties. I have had the opportunity to help many families overcome them. I am proud of my achievements."

16th Maccabiah on

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The international Maccabi community performed a backflip of record proportions last week as it decided to proceed with the 16th Maccabiah Games rather than opt for postponement.

Maccabi Canada reversed its previously stated position that it would prefer a one-year postponement, and instead, the organization's national executive voted to participate in the Games, which run from July 16-26. One person who will not be accompanying the team to Israel is Maccabi President Roy Salomon, who unexpectedly announced his resignation from Maccabi Canada and as co-chair of the North American Confederation of the Maccabi World Union (MWU).

The announcements late last week culminated a hectic day of uncertainty, but it appears the decision by Maccabi USA to participate in the games swayed the Canadian vote and may have influenced Salomon's decision. Salomon declined to comment about his resignation.

Less than a week before, both Maccabi Canada and Maccabi USA had left two days of meetings in Israel prepared to recommend postponement of the games. They cited security concerns, the withdrawal of about 20 percent of each team's athletes and the likelihood of a diminished Games as the main reasons for their positions.

Reports that the 16th Games would not go ahead angered Israeli politicians, who accused world Maccabi organizations of being fairweather friends. Average Israelis were said to be disappointed by the decision.

Assimilation threatens Jewry: Chief Rabbi

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It is no coincidence, asserts Rabbi Israel Meir Lau, Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Israel, that the Hebrew words for flood, mabul, and the one for assimilation, hitbulalut, have the same root, meaning chaotic confusion.

Both pose the same danger to the very existence of the Jewish people, he said in an interview during a recent visit to Toronto.

Rabbi Lau was in Canada to speak in Montreal and Toronto on behalf of Canadian Friends of Laniado Hospital, which is celebrating its 25th anniversary.

Rabbi Israel Meir Lau

Laniado Hospital, in Netanya, is the only comprehensive health centre in the area, and is part of the Israel Defence Force's strategic planning for the multi-injured and victims of war.

When World War II ended, Rabbi Lau said, there were 12 million Jews in the world, of whom six million were in the United States. This number has been augmented more recently by immigration to North America from Russia, South Africa and Israel.

Assuming the average Jewish family has 2.3 children, the rabbi continued, the population of the American Jewish community should be 36 million. Instead, he said, it is 3.6 million – 10 percent of what it should be.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Prayer Upheld

TORONTO — Ontario's Human Rights Commission cannot interfere in the affairs of the provincial legislature, the Ontario Court of Appeal ruled this month. In a 3-0 decision that upholds the right of the speaker to recite the Lord's Prayer, the court said the government house is protected from judicial interference on all matters, even when those matters are offensive to some. The case was brought to court by Penetanguishene resident Henry Freitag, who previously had successfully challenged the recitation of the Lord's Prayer at municipal council meetings.

Apology Demanded

TORONTO — Jewish groups expressed anger and concern last week over statements by former deputy minister of education Duncan Green that independent school tax credits will produce an increase in racism and religious intolerance. Green made the comments to the government committee on Bill 45. Canadian Jewish Congress termed the remarks "startling, divisive and unconscionable," and demanded Green issue an immediate apology.

ISRAEL

Commits Suicide

JERUSALEM — The owner of an Israeli banquet hall hanged himself last week, hours after his licence was revoked for failure to meet safety regulations. The incident came against a backdrop of stepped-up activities by local authorities to enforce building codes and regulations following last month's wedding hall collapse in which 23 people were killed.

'Compensation' Paid

JERUSALEM — An Israeli parliamentary committee has approved payment of approximately $750 each to the families of the victims in the suicide bombing of a Tel Aviv disco earlier this month. Twenty Israelis were killed in the attack, most of them young immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

WORLD

Rabbi Murdered

ZURICH — Switzerland's Jewish community reacted with shock and fear after a 71-year-old rabbi visiting from Israel was gunned down in the streets here. Swiss investigators said they believe anti-Semitism or a political motive was behind the June 7 shooting death of Rabbi Abraham Greenbaum. They said robbery was an unlikely motive because the killer did not take the large sum of cash Rabbi Greenbaum was carrying. A father of 12 and dean of a yeshiva in Bnei Brak, Rabbi Greenbaum was in Zurich on a fund-raising mission.

Wins Lawsuit

NEW YORK — A U.S. jury has awarded $100,000 to a former telephone company employee who was fired months after becoming Orthodox. The jury agreed with Jeffrey Bander, who says a supervisor told him to shave his beard and stop wearing a yarmulka, and made derogatory remarks. BellSouth, which says it will appeal, maintains Bander was fired because he failed to follow procedures for taking time off.

Circumcision Rules

STOCKHOLM — The World Jewish Congress says it is "totally unacceptable" for Sweden to impose legal restrictions on circumcisions. The new legislation, passed June 1, declares that circumcisions can only be performed after the administration of an analgesic by a doctor, nurse or person with special permit. The law was passed after a circumcision led to the death of a Muslim boy.

Post Honoured

NEW YORK — Media Watch International, the new media watchdog focusing on coverage of Israel and the Middle East, conferred its HonestReporting Award this month on the National Post. The organization's Web site (www.honestreporting.com) notes the paper "has consistently reported the Middle East situation in fair, accurate terms."

Storm of Protest

GENEVA — In response to protests, the World Meteorological Organization has altered its list of names for this summer's typhoons and hurricanes, changing the name of Hurricane Israel to Hurricane Ivo.

Cotler Outlines Mideast Peace Plan

OTTAWA — Montreal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler rose in the House of Commons last week and identified six principles for the cessation of violence and movements towards Middle East peace. The text of Cotler's suggestions follows:

1. The unequivocal and unconditional cessation of all acts of terrorism and violence.
2. The cessation and desisting from all acts of incitement – the proximate and standing cause of the violence. For it is this teaching of contempt – this demonizing of the other – particularly that which is government sanctioned. This is where it all begins.
3. The ending of the culture of impunity and the bringing of the perpetrators of acts of violence and terrorism to justice.
4. The institutionalization of security co-operation and anti-incitement committees between the parties, so as to pre-empt acts of violence and incitement.
5. The promotion of a culture of prevention through the institutionalization of confidence-building measures.
6. The recommitment to direct negotiations between the parties as a basis for a just and lasting peace.

Jewish groups praise education tax credit

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish groups came out in generous, praise of the Ontario government's tax credits for parents of children in private and faith-based schools, saying the measure is a long overdue dose of equality.

Appearing before the standing committee on Bill 45 last week, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, the Zareinu Educational Centre, and the Board of Jewish Education lauded the provincial Tories' controversial initiative as an important move toward remedying inequities in education funding.

The committee is expected to wrap up public hearings into the tax credit soon, and the legislature is slated to pass Bill 45 before the summer recess.

CJC "fully supports" the phased-in tax credit of up to $3,500 per child, Ontario region chair Ed Morgan told MPPs on the standing committee.

"Although many would have preferred a fully implemented tax credit beginning in 2002, we remain deeply appreciative that at its maturity (in 2006) this measure will relieve a significant part of the cost borne by parents... The burden has been substantially lightened."

The status quo, Morgan said after reading his prepared remarks, "is not a moral option for Ontario."

He noted that the same arguments against public funds for private schools are being made today as in 1985, when the Shapiro Report recommended full funding of independent schools.

Committee member Rosario Marchese, an NDP MPP, said flatly, he disagrees with the initiative, adding his party has never supported public help for private schools.

CJC's Simon Rosenblum responded by citing the results of a 1999 Focus Ontario poll that found the highest levels of support for public funding of independent schools to be among New Democrats.

Thornhill Tory MPP Tina Molinari asked the CJC panel why the public system is not an option for many Jewish families.

CJC Ontario region director Bernie Farber answered that Orthodox children especially cannot be accommodated in the public system because of special requirements revolving around diet and holy days. "They want a system to inculcate Jewish history and values. The public system should not and cannot do that."

Referring to the fully funded Catholic system, Farber added: "I don't know how anyone can say we can live with a little bit of discrimination. It is not correct. It is not right."

In response to a query from Liberal MPP Gerry Phillips on whether the credit is seen in the Jewish community as a first step toward full funding, Morgan said: "We don't know what future governments will do. We do not quibble with partial help. It's an admirable step."

In her submission to the committee, Carol Goldman, director and principal of Zareinu Educational Centre for children with disabilities, also praised the tax credit.

She explained that it costs Zareinu over $30,000 per year per child to provide the therapy and special education each child needs. Full tuition, she said, is less than half that amount, and less than 20 percent of parents are able to pay full fees.

Zareinu, Goldman stressed, has never turned away a parent unable to pay.

The tax credit "will somewhat ease the financial burden so many of our parents face. We hope this will allow Zareinu to continue offering subsidies to our parents." While the credit "will in no way cover the cost of a child at Zareinu," it will make a difference.

Also appearing before the committee was Seymour Epstein, director of Toronto's Board of Jewish Education, which serves 19 Jewish day schools and 17,000 children.

The "injustice" to non-Catholics who desire a faith-based education continues to be "intolerable," Epstein said, "a veritable stain on the multi-coloured fabric of Ontario society. Put yourselves in our position for a moment to contemplate what this means, not only financially, but psychologically, in terms of our place in this province."

As well, Robert Samery, head of Jewish Parents for Equality in Education Funding (JPEEF), in his appearance before the committee, cited several legal and historical reasons for governments to accommodate diversity.

Cancellation of Israeli trips said blow to unity

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The cancellation of the Reform movement's summer youth trips to Israel is a blow to Jewish unity, says Rabbi John Moscowitz, senior rabbi at Holy Blossom Temple.

"It is also a large blow to Israel, and a victory for Palestinian terrorists," he said.

Rabbi Moscowitz spoke out after Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC), announced at a recent UAHC board of trustees meeting that the trips were being cancelled.

"Our religious and Zionist commitments run deep and are known to all, but the movement never uses other peoples' children to make a political or ideological point," said Rabbi Yoffie.

Despite the significant adjustments that had already been made to the planned itinerary to ensure the safety of the youths, he said, the volatility of the situation in Israel made it impossible to project what might occur in the next three weeks.

He said in the announcement that the decision to cancel the trips was perhaps the most difficult decision he has had to make since becoming president five years ago. "I am heartbroken about [having] to take this step."

He was exceedingly angry, he said, "at those whose murderous actions forced the UAHC to make this difficult decision."

The North American Federation of Temple Youth (NAFTY) has been sponsoring Israel trips for more than 40 years, and has the largest group of youths travelling to Israel each summer. Last year, 1,500 high school students travelled with NFTY.

This year, registration was lower, and the number of cancellations had grown in recent weeks. About 300 families were still planning on sending their children on the trips.

Rabbi Moscowitz, who spoke out about the cancellation during a Shabbat sermon, said it should be parents who make the decision to keep their children home. "Parents have every right to make their own decisions.

"I urge people to go to Israel because if we all pull out, it will be demoralizing for Israel and for Israelis."

He said he is aware that there are some disappointed youths who would still have gone to Israel.

Rabbi Steven Garten of Temple Israel in Ottawa said he understands Rabbi Yoffie's concern about the safety of the children.

"I believe it was impossible for any congregational rabbi to promise parents that their children would be as safe in Jerusalem as they would be in Ottawa. That is what I usually tell parents before their children leave for Israel. I just could not say that this year."

Instead of cancelling the trips outright, however, Rabbi Garten said he would have been happier if the UAHC had changed the nature of the trips.

"A letter should have gone out to parents telling them that given the circumstances of safety the trips could not be business as usual."

He said the trips could have been run as shorter solidarity trips. "Normally there is a lot of free time on these trips. A solidarity trip would be shorter, and would be for information purposes only.

"This would acknowledge the [safety issue], and it would show public support of Israel."

Rabbi Michael Dolgin of Temple Sinai said that he respects Rabbi Yoffie's decision, but added that the reaction to the cancellations was unfortunate.

"It looks likely that many such trips will be cancelled. It is a shame that the attempt to deal with the issue has given the impression that the Reform movement is anything but 100 percent behind Israel at this difficult time. I think the trips would have been cancelled anyway because of low enrollment."

He has been encouraging Temple Sinai families to sign up for trips, he said, and no one has enrolled.

"I think [the cancellations] were inevitable. What I don't like is that it looks unsupportive of Israel when it is not. I am equally displeased that people are choosing this time to criticize the Reform movement and blame the dissension on Rabbi Yoffie. There is more dissension created by the criticism of the movement than by Rabbi Yoffie's decision," said Rabbi Dolgin.

Rabbi Sharon Sobel, executive director of Canadian Council of Reform Judaism, the Canadian arm of UAHC, said that she supports Rabbi Yoffie and the UAHC board.

"These are underage kids, and we are directly responsible for their safety. When the realization came that the situation was not confined to specific areas, it was hard to guarantee their safety."

As executive director of ARTZA Canada, the Zionist arm of Reform Judaism, Rabbi Sobel said she is trying to put together a trip to Israel. "I would like congregations to form trips. [The cancellations] have nothing to do with support. It is strictly an issue of safety and security."

Will return next week

Rabbis tackle interdenominational 'apartheid' at RA

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A panel consisting of an Orthodox, a Conservative and a Reform rabbi is a rarity, particularly in Toronto, as Rabbi Howard Joseph acknowledged recently on just such a panel.

The session at which the Orthodox rabbi spoke, along with co-panelists Reform Rabbi Jeffrey Salkin and Conservative Rabbi Alan Silverstein, was the final plenary of the convention of the Rabbinical Assembly (RA), the umbrella for Conservative rabbis, held at the Inn on the Park Hotel the first week of June.

"Here in Toronto it's very tough. Orthodox rabbis don't sit on mixed rabbinical councils. In Montreal many of us do, although some do not," said Rabbi Joseph, the spiritual leader of Montreal's Spanish and Portuguese Congregation, on the panel on Rabbinic Leadership in the Changing Jewish Community.

He finds it a "fearsome innovation" that certain Orthodox Jews "would like to identify [Judaism] exclusively by mitzvah observance.

"If piety is defined solely by halachic observance," he said, "there is no religious connection shared with any human being outside of the observant Orthodox community, no common language possible...no possible sense of community."

Pointing out common ground with other denominations, Rabbi Joseph noted that "we are all resistance movements vis-a-vis modernity, with Orthodoxy being the most radical of the bunch."

In the past, Orthodox leaders had a sense of community despite disagreements, but today that sense of connection seems to be lacking, he said.

Rabbi Joseph does see a shift, however, represented by the "chardal" phenomenon (the acronym stands for charedi and dati leumi, or modern Orthodox), representing a "rubbing shoulders" in some communities of the two types of Orthodoxy.

"The question of separation from other Jews is a sinful one," he said.

Rabbi Salkin, author of Putting God on the Guest List and spiritual leader of the Community Synagogue in Port Washington, N.Y., expressed his commitment to "a broader sense of klal Yisrael."

In fact, he said that along with Rabbi Silverstein, a past president of the RA, he has "dreamed aloud" of a combined convention providing an opportunity to study together to the Central Conference of American Rabbis (the Reform rabbinic umbrella), the RA and the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College, "and some day I dream the RCA." The latter acronym refers to the Orthodox umbrella known as the Rabbinical Council of America.

"Pray hard," quipped Rabbi Joseph.

Expounding further on his ideas, Rabbi Salkin said he had "a dream that some day there will be...a common non-Orthodoxy within America, with Reform perhaps representing the left along with the Reconstructionist, and the Conservative representing the right wing."

Rabbi Silverstein of Congregation Agudath Israel in Caldwell, N.J., took issue with the latter idea, although the tone of the entire 90-minute session was never less than cordial, and sometimes warmer. But for the Conservative movement to "be described as non-Orthodox by the Orthodox – and part of liberal Judaism by the Reform – is an impoverishment," said Rabbi Silverstein.

Stressing the need for religious pluralism, he stated that Judaism "needs a centrist option. We have to preserve that as the Orthodox move further to the right and the Reform artfully preserves liberal Judaism."

Reform has changed in recent years, however. The increase in ritual behaviour – the wearing of kippot and tallitot at services, for example – is "soul-stirring," said Rabbi Salkin. "Many of the old-timers are having difficulty with that," he added.

Rabbi Silverstein called for an appreciation of the positive aspects of the other denominations. "We should search for qualities our movements share in common." He believes the three movements "ought to be advocating the centrality of the synagogue" as well as supporting Israel and breaking down the barriers of what has been called a "Jewish apartheid [in which] our kids grow up in separate schools and separate synagogues."

Housing, Jewish homeless on Kehilla conference agenda

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A growing segment of the Jewish community faces homelessness, and the problem of affordable housing in the community is worse than many believe, a conference on the issue was told last week.

The second annual conference of the Kehilla Residential Programme heard a variety of proposals aimed at preventing Jews from falling into the ranks of the homeless, as well as shoring up affordable and subsidized housing in the community.

A forum last Wednesday night at Beth Tzedec Synagogue preceded a day of workshops for experts and workers in the field. The evening panel assembled a dozen experts and volunteers to examine housing policies from all angles: governments, the private sector, including developers, and community efforts. The consensus was that more effort is needed from all three in order to alleviate a growing problem.

At the morning workshops, participants discussed possibilities for three affordable housing sites now in pre-development: Yonge Street and Finch Avenue, Bathurst Street and Rockford Road, and Bloor Street and Spadina Avenue. The sites could provide a combined total of 456 housing units, according to preliminary discussions.

Many in the Jewish community are surprised, even shocked, to discover how serious the lack of affordable housing is, says Nancy Singer, executive director of the Kehilla Residential Programme, founded in 1982 as an arm of UJA FEDERATION's social planning committee to ensure that government housing programs meet the needs of the Jewish community.

To date, Kehilla has spearheaded several affordable housing projects in Toronto, including the Avenel at 262 Ridley Blvd., Habayit Shelanu Seniors Residence on Kendal Ave., Project MARC at 6091 Bathurst St. and the Elm Ridge Seniors Group Living Residence.

Conference panellists noted that the federal government is about to release, over the next four years, $680 million in capital grants aimed at building more affordable units. It's hoped, they added, that provinces and municipalities will also spend more, but they welcomed Ottawa's move.

Naomi Rose, a volunteer with UJA FEDERATION, said "a growing segment of the Jewish community is one step away from being homeless." The problem, she said, is expected to worsen as rents increase and the availability of affordable units decreases.

Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum of Beth Tzedec noted that the waiting list in the Jewish community for affordable housing numbers 3,000 people who can expect to wait for up to 10 years.

Margot Kelly, a CBC Radio journalist who produced a weeklong series on affordable housing earlier this year, noted that Ontario Premier Mike Harris cancelled 17,000 planned affordable housing units when he came to power in 1995. In 1999, Kelly related, only 344 new units were built in Toronto, while at the same time, there were 26,000 evictions in the city. "A combination of factors have created a toxic situation for many," she said.

Mark Guslits, an architect and developer, said the city of Toronto is planning 400 new affordable units through its $11 million Let's Build program. "That's a small drop compared to need," he said. "It's glaringly obvious that we're now the poor sister of other North American cities in this area. Canada lags well behind other countries on this."

Eva Landa of Jewish Family & Child Service said her agency uses the definition of homelessness developed by Anne Golden, who headed the Toronto mayor's task force on the problem: those who are homeless, and those who face "imminent" eviction. Landa said there are 125 families and individuals on the agency's waiting list for affordable housing, and that the average wait is 17 years.

Bill Beatty of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corp. (CMHC) said the vacancy rate in Canadian cities dropped between 1999 and 2000 from 2.5 percent to 1.6 percent, and it's near zero in some places.

Several panellists agreed that only governments can break the logjam in building new units by making construction more attractive to the private sector mainly through tax breaks and other incentives.

Margaret MacAdam of the Baycrest Centre said the "big need" for affordable housing in the coming years will be among the elderly who are disabled, noting that by 2040, half the total population will be over 65, and half of all elderly disabled will be over 85.

She'arim fund-raiser to help school move to BJC

Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Since its inception 22 years ago, She'arim Hebrew Day School has earned a unique reputation as a school for children with learning disabilities.

And as one eight-year-old student said – it is simply a good school.

"[The school] has helped me a lot. I learned this year to read and write in English and Hebrew," said Mitchell Sitzer about the Dr. Abraham Shore Academy She'arim Hebrew Day School before a crowd of 450 people at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

Sitzer has completed his first year at the school and is a grandson of Sam Hennick, honoree at the school's 10th annual fund-raiser brunch.

Hennick's donation to She'arim, in memory of his late wife Sara, will be used for the establishment of The Sara and Sam Hennick Education Centre at the school.

The funds from the Hennick family donation, as well as the assistance of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow, will help She'arim move from its current location at Beth Emeth to a larger space at the Bathurst Jewish Centre in September 2001.

Operating out of small quarters at Beth Emeth since it was co-founded by Rabbi Joseph Kelman, Rabbi Yitzchak Witty and the late Rabbi Sheldon Steinberg, the school plans to eventually accommodate 100 students at its new location.

The class sizes range from six to eight students and the school has at its disposal a psychologist, social worker and art therapist who assist teachers in providing an environment for the students that is conducive to boosting self-esteem.

Hennick's daughter Ellen Turkienicz, who spoke at the brunch, described the value that her late mother Sara placed on the education of her children.

"We were constantly reminded of the importance of learning and of our Jewish traditions. She encouraged all of her children to strive for something more, for something better and ultimately to pursue whatever goals we set for ourselves."

In describing the motivation behind his donation to She'arim, Hennick said, "We were looking for a suitable charity to honour Sara and then along came She'arim. Education, young children, combined with Rabbi Kelman, who was one of Sara's favourite people – this was the perfect one."

"Dad's dedication in assisting She'arim, would have made our Mom kvell,' said Turkienicz. "She too would have been in awe of this commitment to a very special and important school."

Ruth Friedman, a longtime supporter of She'arim, was also honoured at the brunch. She was presented with a brooch for her commitment to the school.

Through speeches, the audience learned how the physically small school has made massive changes in many of its students' lives.

"When I first arrived at She'arim I could barely read and felt insecure about my intelligence," said Anna Neumann a 2001 graduate of the school.

Neumann, who plans to attend CHAT next year, reflected on the role She'arim played in helping her build self-esteem and overcome learning obstacles.

"I came to the belief that I am intelligent and that there are times I need a bit of help with my work. With hard work I am surely going to achieve my goals. With the help I have received from the teachers at She'arim I am going to be able to become whatever I want to be in life," said Neumann.

She'arim recognizes that children with learning disorders can be of average to above-average intelligence. The school attempts to address a child's educational needs by providing instruction in conditions under which the child learns best.

As well, the school aims at reintegrating their students into the mainstream day-school system by teaching strategies that help children overcome learning difficulties.

"As an adult, She'arim means more to me than a school for children with learning disabilities. It is a school that gives the children the opportunity to really shine," said Donna Tayar, a former graduate of She'arim who has returned to the school as a teaching assistant.

And the students certainly did shine that afternoon as they put on a musical performance for the audience in which they delivered messages of acceptance and respect as well as on the impact a community can have on an individual's life.

Accomplishments worthy of celebration

It is that glorious time of year for most Canadian children when the school year draws to an end. Summertime has arrived; schoolbooks are put away; vacation beckons. The memories of the beginning of the school year, some nine months earlier, have been stored in the mind's vast repository of personal narrative to be retrieved one day for recalling or for forgetting.

In truth, summer holidays are not a respite from school but a complement. For all the earth is a classroom and all experience is a teacher. Thus, each year, through nature and discovery, the exciting, difficult, eventful, bittersweet transition from youth to adulthood continues its inevitable pace forward.

Some of our children are advancing from one grade to the next; some are advancing in smaller increments; some are graduating to a new school or out of school altogether. But whatever the advancement, whatever the stage in the transition, the completion of the school year is a high accomplishment worthy of great celebration.

Our fast-paced, consumer-oriented, highly mobile, dizzyingly electronic, pressure-packed, flashy, competitive, western society is a far more complicated place for our children to seek, find and fulfill their natural gifts and abilities than it was even one generation ago for us. Nor is there a jurisdiction in this country where the fiscal, social and pedagogic pressures on schools and on teachers are not mounting by the day. By their increasing demands and diminishing funding, governments are more and more being seen as part of the problem for the educational system rather than as part of the solution.

Jewish tradition pointedly, unambiguously instructs us to teach and instruct our children, each according to his or her abilities. That is our challenge and our sacred duty. But in our resources-depleted educational system, public and private, it has become exceedingly difficult to ensure that no child is shunted to the side or left behind, ignored, derided, deprived or ever made to feel lesser in worth because of his or her unique level of abilities.

It is no exaggeration to say that a great many people are worried about the educational systems – public and private – in our respective communities. But mounting concerns for our children's education and for their future must not cause us to point fingers at each other. Rather, it is incumbent on us all – parents, administrators and teachers, in all school systems – to extend a hand to one another, to maintain open, ongoing dialogue with each other, to co-operate for the betterment of the respective systems and for our children.

Thus, let us hug our children, no matter their age, for having made it through another school year. In the fullness of time, they in turn, will hug their children too and remember with love, the confidence and gratitude we conferred upon them for the wonderful opportunity each year, as summer beckoned, to celebrate their very significant accomplishments.

Please visit Israel now

These are difficult days for Israel. Tension is high, tourism is low. Over $1 billion and thousands of jobs have been lost in this current tourism crisis.

Though Israel needs to see each and every Jewish community member across Canada, fear for family and personal safety is the biggest tourism obstacle we face. We understand your concerns and we cannot pretend that terrorist incidents have not occurred. However, here are some facts for you to consider.

- Virtually all of Israel's most popular tourist sites are open and functioning normally.
- Hotels, taxis and other tourist services are operating as usual.
- Despite the slowdown, more than 100,000 tourists are visiting Israel every month, without incident.
- Most visitors to Israel travel in secure groups on buses that are inspected daily, with access restricted to group members.
- Bus drivers and tour guides are in constant contact with securtiy officials to avoid troubled areas.
- Visitor safety is the primary concern of Israel's Tourism Ministry.

One other reality is undeniable. Israel is a magnificent country, with extraordinary natural beauty, spiritual richness, colourful activities, first-class facilities and nearly 6,000 years of history. The people of Israel are exceptionally warm and will greet you heartily and with open arms.

Most importantly, Israel is yours. It belongs to every Jew. Please make a commitment to visit Israel now and in the near future.

Still time to show the world

No doubt the present volatile atmosphere in Israel and the unrelenting violence there has contributed to the fact that some of the anticipated entrants in the Maccabi Games have lost heart to face up to the prevailing conditions there.

Those who have – regretfully – shown themselves to be afraid to set foot in Israel have shown themselves to be as mice amongst men. They are – and again regretfully – prepared to sit on the sidelines while men who are men face up to the Arabs who scream for death to the Jews and destruction of Israel.

Make no mistake about it – each and every cancellation of entry into the Games has been hailed a victory by Arafat.

Nevertheless, there is still time for those who have cancelled their entry to rethink the matter. They still have time to show a change of heart, to realize that the Games are an opportunity to show the Arabs and the whole world that every Jew is obligated to give all help possible to make Israel a proud and vibrant state.

There still is time to make a full house of this year's Maccabi Games.

Clarifying NFTY numbers

Regarding the facts concerning the Reform NFTY trips this summer, the decision affected about 325 registered participants, not 1,500. The number 1,500 is the approximate figure of total youngsters who register each year, but because of this year's situation, the numbers were down considerably and cancellations were being received daily until the UAHC announcement.

Bring Arafat to justice

Not since Hitler's Nazis has there been such a string of killings of innocent Jewish men, women and children simply because they were Jews. The latest murderous attack in Tel Aviv, killing 20 and injuring 86 or more, is the latest outrageous example of inhumanity.

Insincere condemnations by a sneering Yasser Arafat no longer suffice. If he does not ban the leaders of terrorist organizations such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad who celebrate these atrocities, then he should be brought before the International Court of Justice and tried as a war criminal.

Once and for all, let us hear from a Muslim religious leader stating emphatically that suicide bombings are contrary to the beliefs of Islam and that the perpetrators are, plain and simply, sinners in violation of their faith's true values and principles.

First few years are important

With reference to the article by Bruce Elman on having your kids enjoy being Jewish (CJN, May 17), I am close to 80 and my Judaism was ingrained in me from the age of six when I was first allowed to stay up for the Friday night dinner. During the next seven years, each Friday night before we sat down for dinner, my father blessed each child and my mother lit the Shabbat candles. Now the Friday night tradition is being handed to my grandchildren.

A letter to a North American friend

By RABBI DONNIEL HARTMAN

Dear friend:

We have been through a lot together these last 53 years. We have participated in the rebirth and building of Israel and ensuring that no Jew is at risk around the world. That is no small feat for a people who was on the brink of annihilation so short a time ago. Together, over the last 10 years, we have been focusing more of our efforts on the quality of Israeli and Jewish life and the meaning and purpose of our collective identity.

Issues of social justice and welfare, Jewish identity and religious pluralism finally took centre stage. Our greatest achievements were yet to come. I am writing because your actions these past eight months are undermining our future together, and threaten, I believe, the meaning and vitality of Jewish life. I am writing with mixed emotions of pain, disappointment and embarrassment. I do not believe this has been your finest hour and we here in Israel are equally to blame. While it is painful, in some sense I do understand those who hesitate to send their children here this summer. I too have children. They are 18, 14 and 11, and I am constantly afraid for their safety. Every day, my wife and I are instituting new rules and limitations on their activities so that we can function under the myth that we have some measure of control over their health and well-being.

It is a difficult time for us all and I truly understand and relate to your fears as well. However, while the focus is now on youth summer trips, the truth is that you, the adults, stopped coming months ago. When adults and leadership do not come, it is wrong to send your children. Meanwhile, Palestinian children are willing to die for their claim to this land, world Jewry is not even willing to come here to visit.

Something has happened to our relationship. Your not coming is not the problem. It is but a symptom of a relationship which has lost its meaning. As long as the defining component of Jewish life was to participate in overcoming the crisis of Jewish survival, both the precarious reality of Israel and the role Israel played in ensuring the safety of Jews at risk around the world ensured that Israel was a central part of your lives. Israel, however, is on the road to success, and many Jews today want more from their Judaism than only participating in a struggle for survival. For them the central question is not what does Israel need from me, but what does Israel mean to me, a question they do not know how to answer. When the relationship with Israel is defined only as a tzedakah, then it is central only so long as Israel is a charity case. As a result, we were replaced by the Former Soviet Union and your local needs. World Jewry has not rejected Israel. Our relationship has simply lost its meaning.

We have been through a lot together these last 53 years

I believe that this is a tragedy for us both. While crisis was the major carrier of the relationship in the past, it did not define the importance and purpose of the relationship. For the past 53 years, to be a Jew was enriched and shaped by the reality of Israel. To be a Jew became more than faith, ritual and ethics, nor was it exhausted by synagogue affiliation.

Through Israel, Jews understood themselves as a people, a nation engaged with a whole new scope of issues and opportunities, which in turn gave new meaning and vibrancy to Jewish life. We grew beyond a Judaism defined exclusively by the issues of synagogues and study halls, and embraced the breadth of social, political, moral and cultural concerns which accompany a community attempting to build a nation and live as a people. The contribution of Israel to Judaism and the Jewish people is immeasurable; it redefined the scope of our thoughts and aspirations.

An Israeli reflects upon the recent murder of 20 mostly teenage fellow citizens at a makeshift memorial on the site where they were killed. Such acts of terror are frightening World Jewry away from Israel. [RNS/Reuters photo]

In addition, it is because of Israel that we discovered a new sense of Jewish pride, dignity, courage, unity and strength, without which Jewish continuity and renaissance would be impaired. Without Israel, American Jewry would lose its identity as a part of a larger people, and would be comparable to a minor church with a few million adherents.

Without world Jewry, however, Israel would also lose much of its meaning and importance. Its primary role would be as a nation serving a few million recent immigrants to an area where they are the minority. Under these conditions, why should Israel be a Jewish state and not a state of all its citizens? Why should Judaism play a role in shaping the identity of the country and not an Israeli culture assimilated into the majority culture of the area? Without Israel, world Jewry may lose their identity as a nation, but without world Jewry, Israel is in danger of losing its connection to Judaism. It is only because Israel serves and represents a people founded upon a religious affiliation rather than pure nationalism that Israel must be a Jewish state.

Yet Israel has been separated from the Jewish renaissance in America and is viewed as an overseas funding allocation instead of as a local need capable of playing an essential role in the renaissance of our people. At the same time, in Israel, world Jewry is viewed as a source for financial assistance, to be marginalized when the assistance is not critical. Jews around the world are not viewed as real partners who have a stake in this country and who must be respected and made to feel that this is also their home.

We have made mistakes. Let's not exacerbate them by turning these mistakes into ideologies. We have important work to do together. We have to rebuild our relationship, rebuild our joint identity and purpose and thus give meaning to being a Jew and an Israeli in the modern world. Come. Not on solidarity missions to a people in need, only to bring gifts to the children of Gilo and funds for armoured buses. That just perpetuates the old relationship which is not working anymore. Come to be with us and see a people who, despite the difficulties, are responding to terror with the courage to go on with our lives because we believe that Israel is worth the sacrifice. Come so that you too can make this same statement and thus lay claim your rightful share in Israel. Come so that we can learn, think and work together at giving new content to what we mean to each other and what it means to be a Jew today. Come because our finest chapter is not yet written and we need to write it together.

A cancelled trip

I am writing this column on June 11, while a shaky ceasefire in Israel was breached again and, as usual, both sides blamed each other for killing the fragile stand-off. My subject today concerns the cancellation by the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC) of its Israel trips for teenagers. Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of the Union, supplemented this move by saying, "We don't make political statements with children."

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The cancellation provoked an angry outcry from the Israeli media, the ordinarily low key Jerusalem Post calling the Yoffie decision "a Reform blow to Jewish unity." Other Israelis, among them Mayor Ehud Olmert of Jerusalem, chimed in and made the Reform movement rather than Rabbi Yoffie the target of their critique. The issue was thus moved from the area of worry over the children's safety to an ideological battle- ground. Critics claimed that Reform Jews were always lukewarm on Israel, and this was the latest example.

It so happens that I consider the rabbi's decision – or anyway, the way it was handled – to have been an error. I am unhappy to have to say this, because I have the highest regard for Rabbi Yoffie. He is a lifelong Zionist who has moved the Reform movement vigorously into as strong a supporter of Israel as any other. The union's record in making thousands of Jewish children into lovers of Israel has been a shining success and has served as an example to other organizations.

In announcing the cancellation he said, "I consider this to be perhaps the most difficult decision that I have had to make." Parents who had previously registered their children for the trip were having second thoughts, and many relief on the union's judgment of the situation. Rabbi Yoffie and his board decided that he could not assume responsibility for the children's safety.

But there precisely is the nub of the conundrum. I do not believe that this responsibility was the union's to start with. It was the parents' judgment and, instead of the cancellation, the union should have told the families that every safety measure possible would be undertaken by the sponsors. No parent expected the UAHC to guarantee the safety of the journey.

Having written this, I must admit that it is one thing to write this as a critic; it is another to be – like Rabbi Yoffie – on the front lines of decision. Mine is an armchair opinion, without the weight of responsibility.

Meanwhile, the Israeli press had not done itself proud. The longtime battle of the establishment with the Progressive movement has found renewed reason to accuse Reform of non-Zionism or worse. It happens that other organizations too made the same decision, but no such blame was levelled against them.

In sum, I wish that the union had handled the matter differently. Rabbi John Moscowitz, preaching at Holy Blossom last Shabbat, also took that position. Like him, I know that making important decisions is often hard, and so is criticizing an admired friend.

Countdown to Atlantic summer

So summer is almost here! We will experience the beautiful days, warmth, sun and a much-needed break. For students, a more glorious time simply does not exist. After a year of hard work, the seasonal break is well-deserved and essential so that we can recharge our batteries.

Darcie Richler in Halifax

Time can be spent in many ways. For example, some people work quite hard while others travel and relax.

Several of my friends plan to cover Europe or view the Australian Outback. They will travel their way through breath-taking places and will hopefully love the experience. They will taste the food, see the sights and swim in beautiful oceans.

I have chosen to spend my summer among good friends. I will spend my time outside, rain or shine. I will eat jam sandwiches because peanut butter is no longer allowed. If I am lucky I will get my underwear back from the laundry…maybe even in the same colour that it was sent. And you have not even heard the best part yet – I will be getting paid to do all this.

For those who have not guessed yet, I will be going to camp this summer. I have attended overnight camp since 1988 and Camp Kadimah since 1993. Every year I count down the days until the start of the new season.

Camp Kadimah is located near Lunenburg, N.S. The facility is over half a century old and has been the meeting place for many of the Jewish youngsters of the Atlantic region.

To say that Kadimah is just "a special place" would be an understatement. While the demographics and size of the camp have expanded over the past few years, with a considerable number of campers coming from outside Atlantic Canada, Kadimah has been the lifeline for Jewish kids in the region. Marriages have come about because of camp relationships, and lifetime friendships and memories have been formed.

I originally chose Kadimah for something different from what was offered in Ontario. At the time, I had just completed Jewish elementary day school and was searching for the right summer follow-up. Kadimah provided an environment where Judaism was never forced upon campers – it was simply woven through the culture of the camp, and the values followed right behind that. What I also gained was an extraordinary group of friends, and summers I still think about with a smile.

As a staff member, I have always worked on the waterfront. This will be my second summer as the sailing director. Most staff at Kadimah have attended as campers first; so they feel a strong connection to the camp and want to return to give back what they received as campers. Kadimah is known for its unique spirit – something that the leadership, staff and older campers have passed along for as long as the camp has existed.

In the 2000 season, Kadimah bid farewell to longtimers Sheldon Cohen, the director, and Michael Soberman, the assistant director. Leadership has been capably assumed by Marty Zatzman as director and Ann Raskin who will act as assistant director. Both have spent many years at Kadimah and will be maintaining the traditions of the camp while at the same time bringing a new perspective. Camp will continue to flourish.

Until next month, when I'll write a mid-season camp report, may you all have a fun and safe summer.

***

While I have not written yet about it this month, many of my thoughts have been with Israel. We can only hope that the senseless loss of 20 of the nation's youth on Tel Aviv Beach may bring about a turning point in the conflict and eventually, a summer without bloodshed.

Time to stand together

Ever since I went to Israel in December, I have advocated visiting the Holy Land, and I was quick to say that even though a serious conflict is occurring, you still feel safe. In December, I did feel safe. I felt that I could walk down Ben Yehuda Street or lie on the beach in Tel Aviv. At the time it was also hard to imagine how chaotic things were going to become.

Bryan Barzykowski in Winnipeg

While my brother was in Israel recently, the bomb that killed 20 teenagers went off in Tel Aviv. Just days before, he and several of his friends were minutes from where the attack occurred. Immediately warning sirens went off in the minds all of parents who had kids in Israel.

The bombing, coupled with the terrorist attack at the Russian compound in Jerusalem a few days earlier, set off my mental sirens as well. My perception of safety in Israel drastically changed.

When attacks happen in the territories, it is easy to dismiss the danger, because you know that if you were to visit Israel you would not go to Gaza or Ramallah. When attacks happen in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, the danger becomes much more real and immediate. I have been very close to the place where the Tel Aviv bomb went off, and in December, I was just a few feet away from where the attack happened in Jerusalem.

Tourism in Israel has been on the decline since October and these attacks make it even harder for someone to justify travelling there. A trip that left from Winnipeg in the middle of May was cut short by two weeks, and a full Winnipeg Birthright trip ended up sending only a handful of young people.

Many of my friends who are planning to attend Hebrew University next year are now having second thoughts. Everyone's perception of Israel is spinning out of control. What are we supposed to think or do?

Israel is our homeland; it is a place where we can feel comfortable and, most importantly, safe. Today this is somewhat of a contradiction, because it is hard to feel safe and comfortable in the land of milk and honey. After the attack at the Russian compound, my friends at Hebrew U went to an Internet café, which is steps away from where the bomb went off. They told me that the café was empty and a reporter came up to them to ask why they were there. It is obvious that the citizens of Israel are apprehensive and at their wits' end.

If the people of Israel are nervous and distraught, how are we supposed to feel? What do we do? How can we support Israel in this time of turmoil? It is understandable why people would not choose to visit Israel at this moment, but what else is there to do?

I think it is time that Palestinians and Jews outside of Israel take a stand together and show Israel and Palestine that peace needs to come now, or more victims will be counted. A peace rally maybe? What about writing letters to newspapers and government officials, or maybe some sort of city-wide program. Figuring out what we can do is about as complex as the actual situation in Israel.

Living through this conflict from a perspective outside of Israel is very frustrating to me because of the lack of action that I can take to do something productive. It may be naïve of me to think that I could actually do something that could have an impact on this situation, but I feel very helpless when I watch the events on television, and I would jump at the chance to do something that would help Israel and Palestine reach peace.

By now people know that I often ask for advice in these columns and I will do so again here. I would really like to hear a couple of things. What can we do to support peace in Israel? For people who have been there recently, what were your feelings while you were there? And for people who are going in the near future, what are your thoughts about taking a trip to Israel? I would really like to publish some of these responses, because there are so many different perspectives on the conflict and the newspaper is one way that we can share our opinions and have a say (even if it is a small one) in what is occurring in the Middle East.

Peki'in - a village with a unique history

A legendary Jewish tradition appears to be drawing to a close in the quaint Israeli-Arab village of Peki'in.

Tucked into the green, pastoral folds of the Upper Galilee, Peki'in has the distinction of being Israel's only settlement with an uninterrupted Jewish presence stretching back to the Second Temple period, almost 2,000 years ago.

Sheldon Kirshner in Israel

Jews lived in Peki'in, near Mt. Meron, Israel's highest peak, nearly 1,000 years before the arrival of Muslims in the late 11th century, of Christians during the Crusades and of Druze in the 18th century.

A sleepy, unobtrusive place a short drive from Safed, Peki'in once had a fairly sizeable Jewish community. But over the centuries, due to a variety of reasons, the Jews gradually left, drastically changing Peki'in's demographic character.

Now inhabited by a few thousand Druze, with a sprinkling of Muslim and Christian Arabs, Peki'in is all but bereft of Jews at the start of a new millennium. And the prognosis is bleak. The two remaining Jews, Margalit Zinati, 69, and Ilan Tomeh, 43, both single, are getting on.

I met them one afternoon last month, following a vigorous three-hour hike through the scenic hills and dales of the Galilee. My first impression of Peki'in, from the vantage point of a wooded slope ablaze with sunflowers and studded with thorns, was dreamy. A jumble of boxy, closely set white buildings implanted on terraces, it shimmered under a beneficent sun.

Could this be the fabled place where Jews have resided continuously since the Bar-Kochba revolt against the Romans?

Although Peki'in has all the material conveniences of the new century, it exudes a somewhat exotic, other-wordly ambience, as if its past is of greater importance than its present or future.

As my guide and I, tired from the day's exertions, struggled up yet another street on a gravity-defying angle, we stumbled upon the ancient, weather-beaten tomb of Rebbe Yossi, a mystic whose claim to fame is his inclusion in the Zohar.

Composed in the second century by Shimon Bar Yohai and his disciples, the Zohar was originally published in Spain in the 13th century. Written in Aramaic and Hebrew, it is a kabbalistic masterwork.

Climbing a flight of winding steps abutting several Druze homes, I reached the cave of Shimon Bar Yohai, also known as Shimon Ben Yohai. The small space in front of the cave is shaded by mature carob trees, and is a cool refuge on even the hottest of days.

Fleeing Roman persecution after having been charged with sedition as one of the ringleaders of the Bar Kochba revolt (132-135 CE), Bar Yohai and his son, Eleazer, hid in that dank cave for 13 years, subsisting on carobs, mulberries and water. Amid privation, he began writing the Zohar.

After his death, he was buried on the slopes of Mt. Meron, and his tomb became a mecca of pilgrims, particularly on Lag Ba'omer. Around this time, Jews, including members of the Zinati clan, took up residence in Peki'in.

Moses Basola, a 16th century Jewish traveller, described the Jews he met in Peki'in as fellahin, Arabic for peasant. Having adopted the external trappings of their Muslim neighbours, they resembled Arabs, outwardly at least.

By all accounts, the Jews and Arabs of Peki'in coexisted in harmony. During the 17th century, Jews from other parts of the Galilee settled in Peki'in, which, owing to its temperate climate, doubled as a summer resort for Jewish families from sweltering Tiberias.

Engaged in commerce, farming, the cultivation of silkworms, the leasing of land and the study of Torah and the Zohar, the Jews of Peki'in prospered.

In the wake of the 1759 earthquake in Safed, Peki'in's Jewish community was augmented by new arrivals, and a yeshiva was established.

Passing through Peki'in in 1764, Simcha Ben Joshua wrote: "In Peki'in there are Jews, some 50 households, workers of the land and vineyards."

Sixty years later, another Jewish traveller from the Diaspora, David of Vilna, observed: "Peki'in is ... full of lemon trees and sweet apples; and milk, butter, cheese and honey is sent to the whole of Eretz Yisrael and the Mediterranean coast as far as Damascus... There are about 20 Jewish families here, natives of the land. Most have herds of sheep or goats..."

In 1873, the Jews of Peki'in built a synagogue incorporating the remains of a wall from a Second Temple shul. Used today only when minyans are raised, the synagogue was restored in 1926 and again in 1956.

By 1876, the Jewish community had fallen on hard times. Rehamim Oppetecker, a chronicler from Jerusalem, lamented: "Near Tiberias lies the village of Peki'in. I could not get there because the roads were too bad. But while I was in Tiberias, I met the shochet of Peki'in, who told me that there are only 12 Jewish families, and they do not work the land as in former times, because they have no fields and no vineyards."

During the 1929 Arab disturbances in Palestine, the Jews of Peki'in fled, only to return some weeks and months later.

The Arab Revolt of 1936-39 prompted another Jewish exodus, this one initiated by the British colonial rulers of Palestine.

After the creation of Israel in 1948, one Jewish family, the Zinatis, moved back.

Born and bred in Peki'in, Margalit Zinati is the last of the Zinatis here.

Though feisty, rambunctious and suspicious, she is actually a kind, hospitable woman, offering two unexpected visitors refreshments. Never married, she lives very simply, in a tiny second-storey apartment festooned with an Israeli flag on the balcony and cluttered with furniture, bedding and food. On an unadorned wall hangs a picture of her late mother, Mazal, who died recently.

Margalit Zinati, clad on this warm spring day in a plain print dress that could pass for a nightgown, is the keeper of the keys to the synagogue. Fiercely possessive of her role, she deeply resents supposed claims to her title by Ilan Tomeh.

Barely on speaking terms with him, she dismissively regards Tomeh as an interloper, saying that he has upset the status quo by claiming "ownership" of the synagogue.

Tomeh, Zinaiti's next door neighbour, was born in Hadera, which he refers to as " the galut." The Tomehs, one of the original inhabitants of Peki'in, were evacuated after the outbreak of the Arab Revolt. Having promised his grandfather he would return, he settled in Peki'in in 1993, leaving an estranged wife and son behind in Tel Aviv.

Tomeh, wearing an embroidered skull cap, lives in an unkempt apartment purchased by the Jewish National Fund and the Jewish Agency. It is filled with battered furniture, sepia-coloured photographs of relatives and bric-a-brac. Currently unemployed and on welfare, he claims that the government wants him to leave Peki'in. "I don't understand it," he said, more in puzzlement than in anger.

Sipping home-made lemonade, he voiced the forlorn hope that Peki'in will attract Jewish settlers.

It is not likely to happen. Peki'in, Jewishly speaking, is on its last legs.

After virtually 2,000 years, Margalit Zinati and Ilan Tomeh appear to be the last of their kind in the picture postcard village of Peki'in.

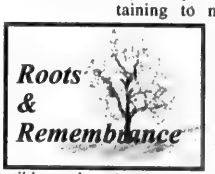
Ellis Island records now online

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

The biggest genealogical story of the year, and conceivably of the decade, is the opening this past April 17 of the Ellis Island Database (EIDB) Web site at www.ellisisland records.org.

Thanks to the Herculean labours of an army of 12,000 volunteers, the passenger records of some 22 million immigrants who arrived at the port of New York between 1892 and 1924 are ostensibly at the fingertips of anyone who can surf the Internet.



An estimated 100 million Americans, and probably millions of Canadians, are descended from Ellis Island immigrants. In the days of massive immigration to North America, which coincided with the largest mass migration in Jewish history, Ellis Island was the main gateway to the interior, even for those whose ultimate destination was Canada.

The system allows one to search by surname (with or without first name or initial), gender, year of arrival, ethnicity, port of departure and name of ship.

With a bit of luck, the searcher might find a text version as well as a scanned facsimile of an ancestral passenger manifest in only minutes, along with a picture of the ship that brought the ancestor to the "Goldene Medina."

In several hours of searching, I found passenger records for numerous relatives, corroborating details of my family's history. One record, pertaining to my great-grandfather's nephew, indicates he was intending to join his uncle in Kingston, Ontario: the year was 1908.

That's on my mother's side. On my father's side, the system has produced no trace of a passenger list already in my possession, showing an ancestor's arrival to Ellis Island in 1909. Perhaps the transcriber misspelled the name.

To a genealogist, there's nothing quite so valuable as a U.S. passenger manifest, which offers an average of 15 columns of information for the early years after 1885, and as many as 36 columns later on. The information includes the passenger's name, age, gender, marital status, occupation, physical description and the name (and often address) of relatives back home and at the passenger's destination.

Not surprisingly, the EIDB web site has attracted enormous traffic. In its first six hours it received 8 million visitors at an average rate of 27,000 hits per second. Usage has now flattened out at about 9 million hits per day.

Many users have been frustrated because the system, despite upgrades, continues to be overloaded and sluggish. Many have discovered they may avoid peak-usage problems by logging on at 3 a.m.

Although the EIDB's basic search engine does not permit searches by multiple variables simultaneously, numerous home remedies have been circulating, including one devised by Steve Morse, inventor of the Intel 8086 microprocessor that revolutionized the computer industry.

To be fair, any search engine would have trouble with this database. How does one search for a surname that may have been written in semi-legible handwriting in any of 30 variant spellings, and later transcribed from an overexposed microfilm?

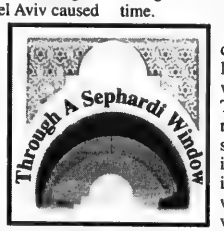
In short, patience is required. As one wag puts it: "Remember that the records may well have been written in English by a Danish steward on a German ship leaving a port in Norway with your Russian ancestor who had a Hebrew name and spoke Yiddish and carried a Lithuanian passport."

The LDS or Mormon Church, which co-ordinated this project since its inception in 1993, says it was the most difficult extraction project it has ever attempted. Besides the Church, immeasurably huge laurels go to the U.S. National Park Service and the Statue of Liberty-Ellis Island Foundation, its partners in this dazzling achievement which has brought genealogy to the masses as never before.

Israel needs our very genuine support

By RABBI YEHIEL BENAYON

The chilling aftermath that followed the horrific suicide bombing in the beachside disco of Tel Aviv caused Jew and Arab alike to hold their breath. It wasn't just the shock and repugnance of such a wanton and savage act of terrorism. It was the foreboding and fear of the inevitable escalation. A strong retribution was rightfully demanded by the people, and the Arab population naturally expected it.



Arab areas sat in the still silence of a self-imposed curfew, anxiously awaiting the repercussions. Only the strongest terms of condemnation from around the world and alarm from the Arab nations, combined with this imminent fear of reprisal, gave Arafat no alternative but to rescind his belligerence.

In speaking of cancer, one is generally deemed to be in remission when five years without symptoms pass. In speaking in terms of Mideast terrorist activity, a reprieve of even just a five-week period is a welcome remission. As of this writing, the government of Israel was able to demonstrate its strength in restraint for perhaps a last time.

As a parent with a child studying in Israel, I too held my breath for what seemed inevitable. The issues encompassed not just the immediate safety of my son and the interruption of his studies, but the message that would be clearly conveyed to his fellow students, should we have decided to call him home. Since he is the only North American in a student body of over 400, recalling him would clearly be abandoning ship. It would be a cause of despair to them as it would be a mark of dishonour to him.

I could not choose for my son; instead, I opted to let him choose for himself. The tension of the situation and the insecurity in his voice was palpable even through thousands of telecommunication kilometres. His decision was to stay, whatever were to happen. He would not even register his whereabouts with the Canadian Embassy should there be any further escalations.

We were proud of his decision, yet we cautioned him.

For the first time since the founding of the modern State of Israel, the country is not in dire need of our dollars. There was a time when Golda Meir would implore world Jewry for very genuine and urgent financial support, a time when every political personality would be expected as part of their tenure to travel and to speak at an Israel Bonds function or United Jewish Appeal event. Today, Israel needs the prayers of Diaspora Jews, our political clout and most of all our moral support. We need to impart the feeling that they are not alone in this, a feeling that only a brother can give.

How disconcerting it is when one hears that the Reform movement has cancelled all of its youth trips to Israel this summer. In essence, this is saying to the people of Israel: in your time of need, we cannot be with you. How difficult, if not impossible, it becomes to condemn airlines that refuse to fly into Israel at a time when Jews themselves stop coming. One hopes that this unfortunate decision will not cause a domino effect.

Jewish Life

Crusades 'noble' carnage

Warriors of God*, by James Reston, Jr. Random House.

The Crusades stretched over a period of 200 years, unleashing a frenzy of hate and violence unprecedented before the advent of the technological age and the scourge of Hitler. The madness was initiated in the name of religion by a pope of the Christian church, Urban II, in 1095, as a measure to redirect the energies of warring European barons from their bloody, local disputes into a "noble" quest to reclaim the Holy Land from the "infidel."

Books
Bernard Baskin

Once unleashed, the passion could not be controlled. The violence began with the massacre of Jews, proceeded to the wholesale slaughter of Muslims in their native land, sapped the wealth of Europe and ended with an almost unimaginable death toll on all sides.

In the end, according to the terms of a peace treaty, the Muslims continued to hold Jerusalem and the Crusaders the coastal region from Jaffa to Tyre. Jaffa was won at the cost of thousands of Crusader lives.

There were five major Crusades but only the first Crusade was "successful" in the sense that it managed to capture Jerusalem. In A History of the Jews, Abram L. Sachar writes, "Life was not the same in Europe after the holocausts of the first crusade. The Jews in the oldest and best-established communities lost their buoyancy and their sense of security. Learning decayed and the arts which ornamented civilized life: Who would think of poetry and song with 10,000 martyrs perished along the Rhine? Who could write of talmudic principles when every community still bore scars from the murderous frenzy of the crusaders? Jews drew within their shells and had little to do with Christians. Only gradually, as the horrors of the crusades and their aftermath faded into memory, did the Jews begin to forget their fears."

The third Crusade, spanning the years 1187-92, is perhaps the most interesting of them all and is the burden and concern of this highly readable narrative. It brought two of the most remarkable and fascinating figures of the last millennium into conflict: Saladin, the sultan of Egypt, Syria, Arabia and Mesopotamia, and Richard I, king of England, known as the Lionheart.

The author recounts the life of each man against the background of the passions of the times that brought them face-to-face in fierce combat. Richard is depicted as an anti-Semite, a sadist and homosexual, who nevertheless was a fierce strategist and commander.

Saladin, in 1187, conquered Tiberias, Hattin and Jerusalem, and precipitated the third Crusade. His attitude towards Jews was friendly and tolerant. He issued a manifesto in 1190 inviting Jews to settle in Jerusalem – something prohibited by the Crusaders. There is no historical basis for the belief that Maimonides was Saladin's court physician.

James Reston, Jr., a prolific author and journalist, provides an informative look at both the chivalric structures and deep brutality that governed the mores and conflicts of the crusader age.

Jewish singles & the Internet

BY MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It's a virtual jungle out there.

There are dozens of Jewish dating Web sites promising to help match you with your bashert, your intended. Some are aimed at a general audience while others target very specific Jewish groups. Some services are free while others are for-profit. Some Web sites are simply ads for real-life matchmakers while others allow you to strike up a relationship online. Today, a look at some of these sites.

JDate calls itself the largest Jewish Singles Network on the Internet with nearly 200,000 members and claims that the majority of its members have a degree [http://www.jdate.com]. Although there is no charge to post your personal profile in the JDate database, you will have to pay for a subscription in order to contact other members.

Carol Shaw is founder of the Israel-based A World of Jewish Singles [http://www.worldofsingles.com]. A feature on Shaw in the Jerusalem Post pointed out that she sits on a committee in the Knesset looking at drafting a law to require licensing of all matchmaking agencies. "There are some 'matchmakers' that are no longer in the country because of their unscrupulous dealings. Just as other professions, such as real estate brokers require licensing, licensing of matchmakers will raise the level of expertise and protect the public."

Chabad operates Mit Mazel, which is open to Jewish singles of all affiliations interested in marriage [http://www.mitmazel.com]. Their twist: after you fill out a detailed membership questionnaire and submit a nominal fee, a sponsor from Chabad or a rabbi fills out your sponsorship form. This is their way of ensuring the integrity of the applicant. Once you have found someone interesting in the database, your sponsor contacts the other's sponsor. If both agree that you could be a match, the sponsors release your e-mail addresses, and you are free to contact each other.

Aish HaTorah also operates an online version of its speeddating service [http://www.speeddating.com]. In electronic speeddating, you agree to engage in a series seven-minute anonymous e-mail conversations with seven different people. At the end of each e-mail chat, the computer asks whether you would like to share your e-mail address with your speeddate. If you both say yes, SpeedDating.com sends you your speeddate's e-mail address so that you can pursue a possible relationship.

Big Beautiful Jewish Women is a discussion forum for "Full figured/plus size single Jewish men and women looking for their bashert" [http://clubs.yahoo.com/clubs/bigbeautifuljewishwomen]. Members are single, Jewish and either full figured/plus size themselves or interested in meeting someone who is. I started this club for all of us who want to be loved for ourselves not what we look like. My motto is 'Good things come in small packages, but great things come in big packages.'"

The Interracial Jewish Web will be a place for Jewish couples (both parties are Jewish) and for those who are Jewish and date interracially [http://jewish_interracial.homestead.com]. They will be able to discuss issues pertaining to dating and marrying interracially within Judaism, raising Jewish biracial children and interacting with other Jews and Jewish families. At the moment, the site is still in the planning stages but the webmaster is looking for ideas. (She apologizes for the delay but explains that she has recently married.)

Sometimes eating right can lead to more than just a trimmer waste and lower cholesterol. Jewish Vegan/Vegetarian Singles can be found at [http://www.jewishvegan.com/singlejvveg.html]. There are separate lists for male and female Jewish vegans and vegetarians. One posting is: SJF-NM (never married), vegan, shomeret Shabbat, intelligent, creative, artistic, into history, sports, television, movies, Kabbalah and Gemarah, rock music, seeking gentleman, prefer aged 35-45, vegan, shomer Shabbat, sensitive, intelligent, good conversationalist, etc.

If you would just like to compare notes with other daters on an informal basis, you can post messages on the Jewish Singles Chat Shidduchim Forum [http://www.inservices.com/cgi-bin/wsmbb/wsmbb.cgi?torah]. A posting by an "eliezer74" says that he has a trend in traditional communities where girls are marrying notably older men. Elsewhere in the forum, I learned that after going out with a dozen people, "shaina1" is finally engaged.

I have only mentioned a handful of the Jewish dating services on the Internet. There are several excellent lists where you can find more dating sites, such as Maven [http://maven.co.il/subjects.asp?S=207], the Jewish Lifecycle Page [http://home.att.net/~heshye/life.htm], Jewish Singles Links [http://www.jewishlink.net/singles.html] and the Jewish Internet Portal [http://www.hareshima.com/organizations/dating.asp].

Next week, advice from people looking for love and from the matchmakers themselves.

Fair Funding for Education: Our Community Speaks Out ...

UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region, have prepared this supplement – the 4th in a series – to keep our community informed about the recent provincial tuition tax credit for independent schools

Dear Mr. Harris and Mr. Flaherty,

We, the Vaad Harabonim - The Orthodox Board of Rabbis of Toronto, wish to thank you for your government's recent decision to provide partial funding to parents who send their children to religious schools, thereby beginning to eliminate the discrimination that characterizes the current system. You see, for us there is no choice, because the continuity of our culture and religion requires an educational environment that mirrors and reinforces the home environment. While we certainly recognize the importance of a strong public school system to society, we feel that the government has now begun to recognize the contribution made to this same society by religious minority groups. Until now we have borne the enormous financial burden ourselves, while our Catholic neighbours have received full funding.

Your critics will be vocal in their arguments and will attempt to misinform and frighten the citizens of this province. We need only to look beyond Ontario's borders to see that nowhere else in the Western World does this type of inequity exist and nowhere have their dismal predictions come true. We urge you to stand by your convictions, and to do what is just and fair. We believe that at the end of the day the people of this province will support fairness, and that truth will prevail over the exaggerations of the naysayers and scaremongers.

We will encourage our community to support the government in this matter by writing and faxing letters to the newspapers and to their local MPP's, and by participating in the public debate.

We also designated Saturday, June 16, 2001 (Parshat Shelach) as a day for our Rabbis to address this issue from the pulpit, and to encourage their congregants to voice their support for the provincial government on this issue.

The Jewish community expressed its support for fair funding in education last week as several communal organizations appeared before the Ontario hearings in Toronto on Bill 45 providing tax credits to parents of children in independents schools.

Dr. Seymour Epstein, Executive Director of UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education, encouraged a redefining of the public school system to reflect Ontario's multicultural reality. Citing European models as examples, Epstein said that "a system that offers its citizens the option of using public resources for general studies in whatever reasonable setting they deem suitable to their own ethnic or religious persuasion" will enrich that society by promoting a more inclusive kind of pluralism. From an educational perspective, he argued that the historic inequity in education funding has sent students a powerful message about the treatment of minorities. "The schools cannot teach justice in an environment which is unjust," concluded Epstein.

Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region (CJCONT) lauded the tax credit as a move toward remedying an outstanding inequity and as an affirmation of the principles of cultural protection and choice that are fundamental to Canadian society. "A society-wide embrace of multiculturalism means support for the serious cultural and educational projects of our diverse communities," said Professor Ed Morgan, CJCONT Chair. "Taking multiculturalism seriously means fostering an environment that also accounts for the needs of those whose cultural, intellectual and religious life require a form of education impossible to achieve in the public schools."

Noting the high cost of therapeutic and specialized education, Zareinu Educational Centre Principal Carol Goldman said that the tax credit will ease somewhat the extreme financial burden faced by Zareinu parents and will open the doors for more families to be assisted by Zareinu, Canada's only Jewish day school for severely challenged children.

Fair Funding for Education: Teachers and Students Say ...

"A Jewish education gives all of us in the Jewish community the opportunity to build and perpetuate a strong Jewish future with solid Jewish roots. Everybody should be entitled to receive the education of their choice and I think that it's wrong to deny anyone that chance. Now, with this tax credit, everyone, regardless of their situation can have the opportunity to enjoy seeing their children grow up with a strong, meaningful Jewish education."

— Robbie Goldberg, Grade 10 student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT)

Robbie Goldberg

"Getting a good Jewish education really keeps us grounded and connected to every aspect that goes into being a Jew. It definitely allows us to better understand our past and helps us to learn about the path that we, as Jews, must take in life."

— Lee Grossman, Grade 10 student at CHAT

Lee Grossman

"Going to Jewish day school is intrinsic to our becoming good, strong, well educated members of the Jewish community – as well as the community at large. To be in a Jewish environment with Jewish kids all the time really gives us a sense of our Judaism. It helps us learn about our religion, as well as our lives as Jews. It also helps us learn more about who we are, where we've been, and where we, as Jews, are going."

— Danielle Sagi, Grade 10 student at CHAT

"Jewish day school enables children to live their entire lives – as a whole – as Jews. It lets them live life according to the Jewish calendar. The children are educated as Jews in a way that can't be taught anywhere else. They spend their time with Jewish students and faculty, and the curriculum provides an immersion into Jewish life that simply can't be captured in any other way. In this province, providing funding for one faith and not the others, simply can't be justified. Parents deserve this help, and they need it."

— Zita Gardner, Director of Leo Baeck Day School

"A complete Jewish education is vital because a viable Jewish community demands that its members are literate in, and excited about their Judaism. Without that knowledge and education, there can never be any real depth to Jewish life. Every single individual has both a right and a duty to know their Jewish roots. Even in a general philosophical sense, multiculturalism does not mean 'no cultures'; it means educating people in the riches of their own culture, and encouraging them to use that knowledge for the enrichment of the society as a whole."

— Paul Shaviv, Headmaster of CHAT

Israel's demography said threat to the country

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Israel's status as a Jewish state could be imperilled should it fail to reach a peace agreement with the Palestinians, the former director of Israeli military intelligence warned recently.

In a speech to Canadian Friends of Peace Now at Temple Sinai, General Shlomo Gazit said that the most dangerous long-term threat to Israel's existence is demographic, not the spectre of a possible Arab attack against Israel.

If Israel does not give up the West Bank and the Gaza Strip as part of a peace agreement with the Palestinians, he suggested, its Jewishness may eventually be compromised.

Lack of peace deal could imperil its status as a Jewish state: Gazit

Right now, Gazit explained, 58 percent of the inhabitants of Israel, the West Bank and Gaza are Jewish.

But given the Arabs' higher birth rate, the chances of Jews becoming a minority in their own country one day cannot be underestimated.

Israel should try to come to terms with the Palestinians before the population shifts in favour of the Palestinians, said Gazit, who was in charge of gathering and assessing intelligence for the Israel Defence Force from 1974 to 1979.

Striking an optimistic note, he observed that Israel and the Palestinians are, in fact, close to an agreement, the intifadah notwithstanding.

But in a sombre aside, he pointed out that the only kind of accord Israel can realistically attain with the Palestinians now would be based on mutual wariness.

"Real peace," he said, will not be achieved any time soon.

And the sort of peace he thinks is attainable might not even endure, he admitted.

It could take decades, even centuries, before true reconciliation exists between Israel and its Arab neighbours.

Portraying Jewish settlements in the territories as an impediment to peaceful coexistence, Gazit said they block the possibility of a land-for-peace deal.

On the other hand, they are an inducement to bringing the Palestinians to the negotiating table.

Gazit said that the reason for the collapse of the Camp David summit last July was basically two-fold.

Ehud Barak, Israel's prime minister, did not understand that his quest for an end-of-conflict agreement could force Yasser Arafat of the Palestinian Authority to demand a final resolution of the Palestinian refugee problem.

On the other hand, Arafat assumed that Barak would lose the forthcoming general election and that his hardline successor, Ariel Sharon, would not honour an accord.

In the end, said Gazit, Barak and Arafat did not understand each other.

Gazit acknowledged he is not certain whether Arafat is in full control of the intifadah. But if Arafat continues to fall short of achieving his political goals through the uprising, he will have no motivation to call a halt to it.

The problems facing the Middle East are not generally understood by people outside the region, said Gazit, the former president of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev.

He told several stories to illustrate his point.

In 1967, Arabs found themselves embroiled in a war with Israel they did not seek because they became captives of their rhetoric. A similar situation could recur, he said.

After the 1973 Yom Kippur War, Gazit was sent to Egypt to negotiate a ceasefire with the Egyptian minister of war, who demanded an immediate Israeli withdrawal from the Sinai Peninsula. Gazit asked, 'Why should we trust you?' The Egyptian replied that peace, being in Egypt's vested interest, was necessary to forestall economic ruination.

Neither Israeli military intelligence nor Egypt's foreign minister foresaw Anwar Sadat's historic trip to Jerusalem in 1977. Arab leaders, unshackled by democratic norms, can make momentous decisions about war or peace without a Western-style consultative process.

Prior to the 1996 Israeli election, Shimon Peres, the then prime minister, appointed Gazit as his envoy to Arafat. Gazit warned Arafat that the Likud challenger, Benjamin Netanyahu, might defeat Peres, the Labor party frontrunner. Arafat, not understanding Israeli society, scoffed at the presumption that Peres might lose.

Moral education explored

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Curriculum is never neutral. It's always an ideological instrument that stresses the world view of those in control, says Prof. Carol Ingall.

In Canada and in the United States, Jewish day schools need to be careful when they simply adopt agendas from public schools, says Ingall, a professor at the Jewish Theological Seminary.

Speaking at the recent opening session of the Network for Research for Jewish Education, Ingall said that education is always a reflection of economic, social and political forces.

Ingall noted that whether the education system puts a high priority on drills and testing, or on building self esteem or social, emotional and verbal skills, will depend on the agenda of those in political power.

More discipline and accountability in the classroom is being expected in today's social environment, she said. Curriculum is therefore being adopted that reflects the "neo-Conservative rhetoric which has become so fashionable in the White House."

As such, Ingall said, in today's classrooms, whole language education has been dismissed in favour of old-fashioned phonics-based reading.

"In an era concerned with violence and anti-social behaviour, phonics somehow recalls a vision of Leave it To Beaver, when [things] were simpler, quieter and more obedient," Ingall said.

A focus on increased economic productivity has meant that kindergartens are no longer viewed as a place to develop social, emotional and verbal skills, but rather as venues to raise academic skills.

"Some kindergartens are spending as much as two hours in daily reading drills," Ingall said.

"It's no surprise that many education projects in the United States are being sponsored by local businesses... which promote neo-Conservative values."

Ingall pointed out that Jewish day schools have absorbed the ethos of the public agenda in both its general and Jewish curriculum.

Now that attention is being paid to pro-social behaviour, conflict resolution and the promotion of disciplined children, derech eretz [manners] programs are appearing in Jewish schools.

Historically, Ingall said, Jewish educational curricula have always mirrored trends in the public system.

When the United States was concerned with promoting an American identity, public schools chose heroes who "personified rugged individualism, the dignity of labour, and basic values of thrift, honesty and charity," she said.

And so did the Jewish schools, she said. "It was quite lucky for us that [Theodor] Herzl looks so much like Abraham Lincoln. It made it a very easy sell."

Then, as public school curricula gave way to ethnicity and a "more rainbow-hued coalition," this occurred in Jewish classrooms as well.

Blacks became included in school textbooks, and "Jewish educators followed suit by making a case for inclusion of Sephardi Jewry," Ingall said.

As public schools began to focus on the ethics of community and the making of good neighbours, so did Jewish education adopt the notion of tikkun olam, the fixing of the world.

In many ways, Ingall pointed out, Jewish values have become virtually undistinguishable from contemporary liberal values.

Tikkun olam projects were a perfect cornerstone for moral education in the public schools because they were broadbased enough not to step on anybody's toes.

"It was also perfect for the Jewish schools because it wasn't too Jewish."

"What troubles me," Ingall said, "is the wholesale adoption of a single silver bullet to solve the very complex issues of moral education."

While she believes in tikkun olam projects, Ingall noted that "if moral education in Jewish schools is to be taken seriously and meet our needs... it can't simply be the knee-jerk aping of the latest trends in public education served with a peppering of Jewish terms.

"Moral education must grow organically from the curriculum of the Jewish school even when that curriculum may be at odds with popular culture."

Jewish education, Ingall said, must reflect not only those mitzvot that originate from "those between one human being and the other" but also "between human beings and their God.

"It's from the latter category in which our most deep-seated hungers for transcendence and personal meaning can be found – and that Jewish destiny is fulfilled."

Issues on the agenda

TORONTO — For the first time in 15 years, the Network in Jewish Education held its annual conference in Canada.

The Jewish Teacher Education Program at York University's centre for Jewish studies recently hosted the international meeting of educators.

The conference is a venue for the presentation of research in Jewish education, and is attended by scholars who have shaped the fields of day school, congregational and adult Jewish education in recent years, said Prof. Alex Pomson, the co-ordinator of York's Jewish teacher education program.

Some of the issues discussed at the conference included:

- teachers, teaching methods and their effects in the classroom;
- teachers as researchers – pros and cons of qualitative research;
- differences between native and non-native Hebrew-language teachers at the United Synagogue Day School;
- the value of integration in Jewish education;
- classroom climate in relation to academic outcome and future involvement in the Jewish community;
- characteristics of Jewish adult learners, effective Jewish adult educators; and
- relationships between emotional intelligence and IQs in Jewish day schools.

York University's Jewish teacher education program is a partnership between the faculty of education, the centre for Jewish studies and the faculty of arts, and with the co-operation of UJA FEDERATION's Board of Jewish Education.

Assimilation threatens state of World Jewry

He attributes this partly to the acceptability of civil marriage, something which is not possible in Israel. "That is what happens when everything is permitted. Look at the result – an intermarriage rate of over 50 percent."

Yet the rabbi is not very concerned that civil marriage will take hold in Israel. In the first place, he said, while there are many secular Israelis, when they do need religious rites, they choose the Orthodox path. This includes Sephardi Jews, including many of those who came in the mass aliyah from places like Georgia and Bukhara in the former Soviet Union.

Besides, he said, over 30 members of the Knesset are observant – and not just members of Shas, Mifdal and Degel Hatorah, the religious parties.

Issues of divorce and marriage were declared to be in the purview of the Orthodox rabbinate by the Knesset in 1951, a decision which was reiterated in 1970 during the "Who is a Jew?" debate. Asked what he would do if a serious effort was made to introduce civil marriage in Israel, Rabbi Lau said that he would use his influence.

"I would go to television and the media. I would go from one school to the other [to influence against it]."

Rabbi Lau slammed those who objected to the refusal to bury those victims of the Tel Aviv bombing who were not halachically Jewish together with those who were.

"Don't the majority have rights, too?" he demanded. "How about the yeshiva hesder student who was killed in battle with his kippah on his head? He is also a human being."

That is not to say, he stressed, that those victims should not be buried in an honourable way.

"Just as we have a section in the Tel Aviv cemetery for veterans of Lehi, journalists and several large Sephardi families, so too we have a section in the same cemetery for the righteous among the nations, and for those who aren't Jewish according to Halachah."

Rabbi Lau was equally impassioned when he gave major speeches in Toronto and Montreal.

"We have a right to Israel, the right to Jerusalem as our eternal holy capital," he told audiences at Toronto's Inn on the Park and at Montreal's Shaar Hashomayim Congregation.

Three times a day, he said, Jews pray facing Jerusalem. "We fast four days a year because of tragedies there. On Yom Kippur and Pesach – neither of which seemingly has anything to do with Israel – we end our prayers with the plea 'Next year in the rebuilt Jerusalem.'"

Our relationship with Jerusalem is founded on the Bible, in the stories of Abraham's sacrifice of Isaac on Mount Moriah (considered to be the Temple Mount), in God's promise to the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and in the account of King David's choosing it as his capital 3,000 years ago, Rabbi Lau said.

The young paratroopers who liberated Jerusalem in 1967, "whose feet had never touched the Old City, and whose hands never touched the stones of the Wailing Wall, cried, sang and danced, like someone who had come home."

The name "Jerusalem," including Zion meaning the same thing, appears in the Torah 738 times, Rabbi Lau said. In the Koran, it doesn't appear even once.

Jews want peace, he insisted, but with people "who want peace with us."

When the Temple Mount, the Kotel, Yehuda and Shomron and the Golan were in Arab hands, he said, there was no talk of peace.

"Did you speak to us then? How can I be sure you mean it, when whenever Abba Eban spoke at the United Nations, all the Arab representatives left? What stopped you then? Maybe you don't really mean that you want the territories back – you mean the state."

Let the Arabs recognize the existence of the State of Israel, he urged. "Take the territories back, but before you do, let us live [together] one year in peace."

Rabbi Lau recounted a meeting he had in 1988 with a high-ranking American official. In discussing possible peace plans, the official told Rabbi Lau that the United States would pressure Israel on many issues, including settlements in the territories, but not on the issue of Jerusalem. He said that pressure was possible on other issues because Israelis disagree among themselves, but there would be no pressure on the issue of Jerusalem, precisely because that was the one issue that unites all Israelis, indeed all Jews.

In Montreal, he sent a message for Palestinian suicide bombers. "Don't trust those who send you," he said. "They send you with the promise of paradise, but they do not send themselves. [It is] impossible and immoral" that one will inherit paradise for committing such acts.

Rather, he said, those who commit such acts "are doomed to an eternal hell."

שיחה בינינו

גידי קורן וחברים

ערב חזיר

"נירושין" הם "חתונה" בזמן עתיד.

"וכו..." הוא סימן שאתה עושה כשאתה רוצה שאנשים יאמינו שאתה יודע יותר ממה שאתה בעצם יודע.

"אבא"- בנקאי שניתן מהטבע.

"דמעות"- הכוח החיידראולי שבעורתו העוצמה הגברית מובסת על ידי החולשה הנשית.

Folk ensemble seeks help

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Sarah Sommer Chai Folk Ensemble, one of North America's foremost Israeli dance troupes, has issued a cry for help.

In a recent open letter to the community published in the Jewish Post and News, the 37-year-old dance troupe wrote of its need for new sources of funding and new rehearsal space.

"If we don't find new sources of funding, we could be out of business within 12 months," says Chai president Lorne Weiss.

Chai was formed by the late Sarah Sommer and first began operations in the basement of her home. Initially, it included about a dozen teens, boys and girls. Today, it has 45 dancers and musicians and has performed in almost every major North American city, including Mexico City, as well as in Israel.

"Not only are we one of the oldest continuous Israeli dance troupes around," Weiss says, "but we may be the only one in the world with its own live musical accompaniment.

"Because we are somewhat isolated in Winnipeg, we have developed in our own environment with a repertoire reflecting both our Israeli orientation and our eastern European Jewish heritage."

As Chai has grown and become more sophisticated and widely known, costs for travel, costumes and music have increased. Yet touring is important to the dancers and musicians, Weiss says.

"You can practice as much as you want," he says, "but you also need to perform among your peers.

"A couple of months ago, we had to turn down a performance in Caracas, Venezuela, because we didn't have the money to go," Weiss says. "We have an invitation from Brazil in December which we may have to decline. The success of our fundraising efforts are critical. We can't afford to stand still. We have to keep moving forward."

Though Chai has always received grants from the Peretz School Foundation and the Province of Manitoba's cultural affairs department, the bulk of its operating revenue has been generated by its annual concert at Winnipeg's Centennial Concert Hall.

Yet the concert's associated costs have been rising from year to year as revenues have flattened out, Weiss says.

Rehearsal space has been similarly donated in the past. In times when the real estate market here was soft, the group could always find someone with an empty warehouse to lend for their rehearsals. In the current market, however, warehouse space is at a premium.

In the meantime, since the letter was published, someone has stepped forward to offer commercial space for rehearsals, Weiss says. As well, a group of past Chai presidents met recently to discuss the possibility of canvassing successful Chai alumni to help establish an endowment fund through the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba. And an individual with fund-raising experience has joined the board.

Court ruling vindicates cartoonist

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A cartoon that depicts former teacher Malcolm Ross sharing conspiracy theories with Nazi propagandist Josef Goebbels is fair comment, according to a recent judgement of the New Brunswick Court of Appeal.

The three-man court ruled unanimously that the cartoon is a legitimate comment on the views published by Ross in two of his books.

The verdict reverses a lower court decision that found that the cartoon libeled Ross, and which ordered Saint John cartoonist Josh Beutel to pay $7,500 in damages. Instead, Ross has been ordered to pay court costs of $5,000 to Beutel.

Beutel, who works for several New Brunswick papers, was ecstatic with the decision. "I don't dance very often, but I was dancing when I heard that," he said. "It was a vindication."

The Appeal Court ruled that Beutel acted well within the purview of cartoonists, who employ parody and exaggeration to make a point. The court rejected the lower court's view that while Ross might be a racist and anti-Semite, there was no evidence he was a Nazi or shared the Nazi view that Jews should be exterminated.

The cartoon in question was presented in the spring of 1993 by Beutel to a workshop of the social studies council of the New Brunswick Teachers Association.

The cartoon consisted of two panels; on one side, Ross stands alone, clutching two of his books; in the other a group of Nazis stands before a concentration camp. The word "conspiracy" in bold ink joins the two panels. A caption asks, "what's the difference between the views of Josef Goebbels and Malcolm Ross?

Ross objected to the cartoon, saying it improperly characterized him as a Nazi – a view shared by the lower court.

The Appeal Court rejected that thinking, ruling that the audience for the cartoon would have concluded it was a fair comment on Ross' views that there was a malevolent Jewish conspiracy – views which paralleled those of Goebbels. The Appeal Court did agree with the trial judge "that Ross is a racist and anti-Semite. In my view, the evidence tendered at trial overwhelmingly supports that finding."

Beutel said the decision marked a victory for free expression and countered the chilling effect of the lower court's ruling.

"The chief justice made the point that cartoons are not to be taken literally," he said. "I think it's a release from constraints on more liberal free speech that the original decision put some reins on."

Several interveners had joined the case to argue in support of Beutel, including the Canadian Newspaper Association, the Association of Canadian Editorial Cartoonists, Canadian Jewish Congress, the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada and the Canadian Civil Liberties Association.

Joel Richler, Congress' legal counsel at the appeal, said the case does not break new ground, but "it is an affirmation that the defence of fair comment applies to editorial cartoons."

Richler said the court did not rule one way or another on Congress' contention that in contemporary usage, it is not inappropriate to refer to a racist and an anti-Semite as a Nazi.

Lipton Jews return to roots

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

TORONTO — It was supposed to be a simple ceremonial weekend to commemorate the 100th anniversary of the Lipton Jewish Settlement and Cemetery in Saskatchewan, but many of the Jews who returned to the site where their ancestors had first settled suddenly found themselves on a personal quest to rediscover their roots.

"I found out a lot of things about my ancestors that I otherwise wouldn't have known – and there are still gaps yet to be filled," Martin Zeilig, whose paternal grandparents came to Canada from Romania and settled in Lipton in 1901, said in a telephone interview.

Zeilig's uncle, Harry Zeilig, 93, is the oldest surviving child to be born on the settlement, and his grandparents might have had the first Jewish wedding in the West.

"There were many Jewish farming colonies in the prairies, but the stories of Jewish settlers in the development of the Canadian West are relatively unknown," says Zeilig.

Zeilig, a freelance writer who has begun researching his family history as well as the histories of other Jewish farming settlements, says that Jews fled Romania, Bessarabia and Ukraine and came to Canada with the promise of freedom, land and safety fresh in their minds.

While the Dominion government tended not to want Jewish immigrants, believing that Jews would move quickly to urban centres, Zeilig said that the government and the Canadian Pacific Railway needed pioneers to settle the land.

"But when they got there, circumstances were very difficult. They weren't trained as farmers, climactic conditions were harsh, especially in the winter, and they had to clear the land."

He says the land some of the settlers received wasn't of the best quality, and pioneers had to clear away stones and trees.

Though some settlers stayed on, Zeilig's grandparents moved to Winnipeg in 1914 after their house burned down.

The colony remained a close-knit Jewish community throughout the depression and World War II. The last burial in the Lipton Cemetery occurred in 1951.

While today, Zeilig describes Lipton as "a bit shabby and in need of some maintenance," it is respected by the locals, and plans are underway to have Lipton declared a historic site.

Tribute to Israel

So focused have we been these past nine months on the apparent collapse of the possibility of peace between Israel and the Palestinians and on the resurgent efforts by Israel's enemies to harm the Jewish State that we have forgotten to remember the truly epochal achievements of the young, 53-year-old country.

The most remarkable achievement of this most remarkable State – indeed part of the very theological, historical, philosophical and pragmatic underpinning of its very existence – has been kibbutz galuyot, the ingathering of exiles.

On this page, we see recent images of that ingathering: new immigrants chatting with prime minister David Ben-Gurion in 1949; Jewish refugees from Ethiopia trekking across the hot Sudan desert in November 1984 en route to Israel; and entire families from the former Soviet Union in 1990, boarding their plane in Budapest to take them, finally, to their new homes and new lives in Israel.

Now more than ever, it is important to remember Israel's achievements and help it toward its awaiting possibilities.

As Ben-Gurion wrote more than forty years ago, "I am sure that now we are home again, we shall once more be creative as a people. We have already begun to be so. Today, we are in the process of writing a new 'Torah,' not only with scribes, but with pioneers and farmers, artists and scientists, architects, teachers, engineers, legislators, collectivists, citizens in every walk of life. All speak the language of Moses and even the freethinkers among them study deeply in the Book, the source of inspiration, provider of a past and of a vision for the future. Our new 'Torah' is being written now, but its best chapters are still to come."

In the pages that follow, we present an eclectic array of articles in tribute to Israel.

Gushing river is part of tranquil Tel Dan Park

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In a semi-arid country like Israel, the pleasing gush and roar of a full-throated river is music to the ears.

Here, in Israel's northernmost reaches, the Dan River produces a mesmerizing effect.

The longest and most important source of the Jordan River, the Dan generates 240 million cubic metres of water per year.

Yet for all its importance as a precious life-sustaining spring, the Dan really comes into its own, at least from an esthetic point of view, as an integral component of the Tel Dan Nature Reserve. A blissfully tranquil 120-acre national park, it is enjoyed by countless visitors from Israel and abroad.

This wooded preserve, formed as a park in 1969, was a sensitive military area off-limits to tourists before the Six Day War.

Prior to 1967, Tel Dan, adjoining Kibbutz Dan, was right on the tense Syrian border. In the two decades leading up to the Six Day War, Israel and Syria clashed regularly, sometimes over water rights.

On June 5, the first day of the war, the Syrian army launched an offensive against Kibbutz Dan, but was driven off.

Several days later, Israel captured the Golan Heights, the brooding basalt plateau overlooking the fertile Hula Valley and the shimmering Sea of Galilee.

With the Golan in its hand, Israel turned Tel Dan into a park. It was a labour of love, and the results are simply magnificent.

Although asphalt paths were paved for the convenience and safety of visitors, Tel Dan, thankfully, was left in its wild, original state.

It is an enchanting place, a cool, shady, mossy sanctuary where refracted rays of sunshine glint off a nearly impenetrable tangle of shrubs, bushes and trees.

Tel Dan's Mediterranean forest is fairly thick, bristling with a seemingly endless variety of trees, some of which are ancient and beautifully gnarled: Syrian ash, Atlantic pistachio, laurel, plane, eucalyptus, poplar, Mt. Tabor oaks.

Along the banks of the Dan, riverside vegetation is dense. There are reeds, brambles and bullrushes, as well as ferns and St. John's wort. Here and there, sprays of pink oleander brighten the gloom.

The river, fed by rain and snow melt from Mt. Hermon, presents a remarkable sight. Although puny by world standards and really no more than a glorified stream, the Dan leaves an awesome first impression.

Clear and fast-flowing, it's nurtured by bubbling brooks and gurgling rivulets seeping in from dim nooks and crannies.

Never navigable, the Dan is forbidden to swimmers. And judging by its somewhat menacing whitecaps, you can understand why this rule is in force.

The river abounds with fish and invertebrates: Damascus barbels, Levantine suckers, Jordan loaches, black-shelled snails, crabs and water bugs.

And the region around Tel Dan is rich in bird and wildlife: Cetti's warblers, White wagtails, boars, jackals, foxes and gazelles.

The Dan River is clear and fast-flowing.

There are four trails, each marked with a coloured arrow. The shortest one, with a recommended walking time of one hour, provides a basic overview. The longest, which includes Tel Dan's biblical sites, takes about two and a half hours to negotiate.

Among the sites well worth lingering over are the wading pool, the Atlantic pistachio lookout, the flour mill, the command-post observatory, the ritual site and the Canaanite and Israelite gates.

The wading pool, shallow, serene and ringed by benches, is the only spot in Tel Dan where you can frolic in the water.

From the Atlantic pistachio lookout, a visitor is offered a panoramic view of the reserve, the Hula Valley, Mt. Hermon and the Golan Heights.

The water-powered flour mill, built in the late 18th century and in use until the 1948 Arab-Israeli war, looks positively weathered, a relic of another epoch.

The command-post observatory, used by the Israeli army until the Six Day War, offers vistas of Mt. Hermon, an abandoned Syrian fortification and a pastoral-looking village in southern Lebanon.

On the fringes of Tel Dan, near the river, old Israeli slit trenches are clearly in evidence.

Originally dominated by the Phoenicians of Sidon and known as Laish, Tel Dan is mentioned in early Egyptian texts and in the books of Joshua and Kings.

Captured by the tribe of Dan, and settled continuously until the Roman period, it was the gateway for all northern invasions of the Land of Israel.

Miss Israel trades her high heels for army boots

By MICHAEL S. ARNOLD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Most of the young women competing for the Miss Universe title had nice plans when they left Puerto Rico: modelling contracts, university studies, jobs or vacations with their boyfriends.

Miss Israel, Ilanit Levi, however, faced something a bit more grueling: basic training.

Like most Israeli women, Levi, 19, will have to do a stint in the army, a tour of duty she postponed for six months to prepare for the May 11 beauty pageant in Ruben Rodriguez Coliseum in this industrial suburb of San Juan.

Yet she didn't seem at all bothered by the prospect, clowning around with her fellow contestants in the days before the pageant as if she hadn't a care in the world.

Levi was all business when necessary, however, impressing the judges enough in the weeks of interviews, photo shoots and dance rehearsals leading up to the pageant to earn a spot as a semi-finalist on pageant night.

Miss Israel, Ilanit Levi, models a flak jacket gown she had intended to wear at this year's Miss Universe pageant.
[RNS/Reuters photo]

After an initial pass by all 77 contestants in representative national costumes – and no, Levi didn't wear her famous bulletproof dress – the field was narrowed to the 10 semi-finalists who dominated the rest of the show.

Yet Levi didn't make it to the group of five finalists hampered perhaps by the fact that she was significantly shorter than her competitors – a mere 5 feet 7 inches, next to women measuring close to 6 feet. In addition, her simple black dress seemed rather plain next to the elaborate evening gowns chosen by the other semi-finalists.

Still, Levi's achievement marked the best finish by an Israeli since 1978, the end of a remarkable stretch beginning in 1958 when Miss Israel placed among the Miss Universe semi-finalists or finalists in all but four years.

Israel has won the Miss Universe title only once, when Rina Messinger took the crown in 1976. It won the slightly less prestigious Miss World pageant in 1999. Unlike pageant powerhouses Venezuela and India – which invest years of training and thousands of plastic surgery dollars in promising beauty queens – pageants are not a big business in Israel.

Perhaps as a result, the Israeli contestants often lack the polish and poise that make the difference among outstanding candidates. For example, many of this year's 77 contestants used an interview question about the most interesting event in their lives to mention prizes they had won or volunteer work in humanitarian causes.

Levi, with typical Israeli bluntness, said she couldn't recall anything very interesting.

While it may not have helped her with the judges, her naturalness made Levi one of the more popular girls among the group at the pageant, won by hometown hero Denise Quiones of Puerto Rico.

As the contestants braced themselves for a final rehearsal that lasted from 1 p.m. to nearly midnight the day before the pageant, many slouched in their seats with bored looks on their faces.

Levi was a blur of activity, however, talking, snapping her gum, answering her cell phone and teaching Miss Croatia, Maja Cecic-Vidos, the Hebrew slang for excellent: akhla.

She then dragged Miss New Zealand, Kateao Nehua-Jackson, outside for a quick smoke.

Her family, meanwhile, admired Levi's rehearsal outfit: skintight black Spandex pants with silver flame designs on the flared legs and a sparkling silver halter top.

"Can you believe those pants cost only $20?" Levi's sister, Nitza, asked a friend sitting with her in the audience. "Or was it $21?"

After three weeks in Puerto Rico on a grueling schedule of rehearsals and photo shoots, Levi said she missed Haifa, where she grew up with her four siblings in a single bedroom.

"I'm dying to get home already," she told JTA as admirers tried to pull her away for photographs. "I want to be able to go where I want, when I want to."

That, Nitza said, is just like Ilanit.

"She's not one of those people to let this all go to her head," Nitza said. "She's still the same Ilanit, one of those people who, no matter what happens, still likes their small, warm home."

Indeed, after the show, Levi seemed decidedly nonplussed by her strong finish.

"It was OK," she said. "Not something grandiose or extraordinary."

Her family, in fact, seemed more exuberant than Levi that she had been picked as one of the most beautiful women in the world.

"Ever since I was a kid, I knew my sister was the most beautiful woman," Levi's brother Asher said. "I've been around in the world, and there isn't anyone as beautiful as Ilanit."

On second thought, he admitted, the pageant's hosts – super models Elle MacPherson and Naomi Campbell – came pretty close. But the family said they felt the judges had other considerations when choosing the next Miss Universe.

"It doesn't just come down to beauty here," Nitza Levi said. "There are a lot of other factors, like politics and language."

The changing kibbutz

By DAN IZENBERG
Special to The CJN

For 30 years, ever since his release from the army, Avner Zachs was in charge of dairy farming at Givat Brenner, the second largest kibbutz in Israel.

Zachs, 56, is a member of Givat Brenner's second generation. As such, he was suckled on the ideals of socialism, communal solidarity and sharing, inculcated by his parents and the other founding fathers and mothers of the collective settlement established in 1926.

Zachs believed every word and lived by the creed. In keeping with the highest kibbutz values, he worked hard, his daily schedule largely determined by the timetable and needs of the cows he milked. He had little time left over for friends and other pursuits.

Slowly, over many years, Zachs began to look out at the world beyond him and the ideology of his youth and did not like what he saw. Givat Brenner was drowning in debt and threatened with bankruptcy, the younger generation was leaving the kibbutz in droves, and most of the 630 kibbutz members, including 100 over the age of 80, were either apathetic or demoralized.

Six years ago, he decided to run as secretary of Givat Brenner in order to save the kibbutz. Since then, he has begun to institute changes which he unabashedly believes will destroy the kibbutz as a collective settlement but save the community and its individual members.

Out of the 270 kibbutzim scattered over Israel, more than 100 are heading in the same direction as Givat Brenner.

Tel Aviv University Prof. Eliezer Ben-Raphael, whose book, Crisis and Transformation: The Kibbutz at Century's End, chronicles the transformation of the kibbutz over the past 15 years, listing the changes that have taken place in the kibbutz's economic, social and even internal political arrangements. Here are just a few of them:

- Charging fees for meals in collective dining room;
- Shutting down collective dining room altogether;
- Individual members paying for their own electricity and other utilities and services;
- Abolishing rotation of senior jobs;
- Giving financial rewards for extra work;
- Introducing differential incomes;
- Having freedom of job choice and encouraging outside employment.

Another recent change in kibbutz life is the integration of kibbutz members and outside residents within one setting. Kibbutzim are building private-housing developments for sale to outsiders within their boundaries and renting out vacant housing inside their own residential areas so that in many cases, the community and the kibbutz are no longer one and the same thing.

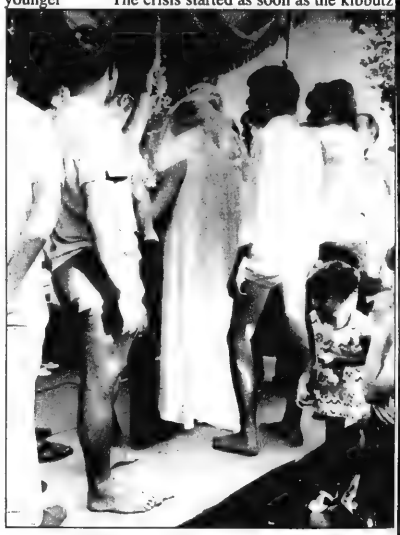
How did these radical changes, which promise to bring down the curtain on one of the great achievements and symbols of the Zionist movement, come about?

According to Ben-Raphael, the kibbutz crisis was caused by two developments – the fall from power of the Labour Party in 1977 and the 1984 national economic recovery program which reduced runaway inflation from over 400 percent to about 25 percent within a year and inadvertently sent interest rates soaring.

According to Ben-Raphael, the kibbutz movement lost its special status with the fall of the Labour Party and the emergence of the Likud. The kibbutzim, which had borrowed extensively during the inflation years to enlarge private housing, build modern dining halls and invest in new enterprises, suddenly found themselves paying real interest rates of 30 to 40 percent. When disaster struck, the government, for the first time, was not there to bail them out.

Zachs accepts the relevance of Ben-Raphael's milestones, but says the trouble began much earlier, after the 1967 Six Day War or even before that.

"The crisis started as soon as the kibbutz began to be less relevant, when it was no longer at the vanguard of the State, no longer produced the leaders of the army or was responsible for protecting the frontiers," Zachs says. "Once the sense of purpose was lost, the strength of the kibbutz and the kibbutz movement began to ebb."



A traditional kibbutz wedding under the chuppah.

The crisis of identity and morale was severely exacerbated by the kibbutzim's economic collapse. Not only was the status of a kibbutz member no longer self-evident, the kibbutzim themselves were suddenly impoverished.

"People began to wonder whether the kibbutz was still relevant," Zachs says. "They asked what was so good about living like this."

Amotz Peleg, the secretary of Kibbutz Hulda, remembers those days very well.

Miss Israel heads from pageant to army

Detractors, however, said politics had worked in Levi's favour. Jase Choenni, manager for Miss Netherlands Reshma Roopram, sketched an elaborate conspiracy theory to explain why his beautiful charge – and fiancée – wasn't a semi-finalist.

Levi was chosen, he said, by judges who wanted to help Israel's international image at a time when most news from the region paints Israel as bloodthirsty and violent.

The national manager for Trinidad & Tobago noted ominously the preponderance of Jewish names among the judges who picked the semi-finalists.

Yet few men who laid eyes on Levi wouldn't do a double take. Her exotic features – she has olive skin and piercing eyes – reflects her international heritage: Her father made aliyah from Morocco, her mother from Libya. There even was enough of a Latin look about Levi to make her a favourite with Puerto Ricans, who compared her to Puerto Rican-American Jennifer Lopez.

Not all the images of Levi that made the local press were flattering, however. One paper used a huge picture of Levi looking angry and bored to depict the contestants' frustration with the preparations for the event.

Levi laughed it off as a chance and candid moment.

"Look, it's really hard work," Nitza Levi said. "They keep them going from morning to evening."

Still, it wasn't quite as challenging as, say, basic training. After the army, Levi hopes to study psychology and work as a children's therapist.

Given the recent months of Mideast violence, it was inevitable that Levi would be asked frequently about politics. As Israel's representative at the forum, she felt obligated to defend the country's image.

The other contestants "want to know how I live, what it's like," she said. "I want to make sure they know that what they read about in the paper, the war and the violence – it exists, but it doesn't dominate our lives."

Still, politics intrudes even into the world of beauty pageants. As in the 2000 pageant – which took place while Israel still occupied its security zone in southern Lebanon – Miss Israel 2001 got the cold shoulder from Miss Lebanon, who was under orders from her government to ignore Levi.

"Our countries are not at war, but" she and Levi "are not going to be friends, either," said Miss Lebanon Sandra Rizk. "We just try to be businesslike."

Levi's closest friends among the contestants were Cecic-Vidos of Croatia, Miss Egypt Sarah Shaheen and Nehua-Jackson of New Zealand.

In fact, Levi admitted, the pageant turned out to be a lot more fun than she imagined.

"I thought it would be like jail, all the time 'Don't do this, don't do that,'" she said. "But none of us here is really thinking about being Miss Universe; it's too overwhelming for us. So we just concentrate on enjoying ourselves."

Natural park is enchanting

In 1966, an Israeli archeologist, Avraham Biran, began to excavate Tel Dan. One of the artifacts his team uncovered was a fossilized tablet from the ninth century BCE. Carved on it, amazingly enough, was an inscription referring to King David.

Of the biblical sights, the Canaanite gate, from the 18th century BCE, is of considerable interest, being one of the earliest complete arches of its kind to be unearthed.

The mud brick Israelite gate, apparently from the First Temple era, is also quite impressive.

The ritual site, from the monarchy period, was part of a temple built by Jeroboam in 930 BCE.

Though these sites momentarily transport you into the misty past, the spell is quickly broken when you visit the adjacent slit trenches. They face Ghazar, a village in southern Lebanon whose status remains unclear, and a deep-green avocado orchard lying directly beneath the Golan Heights.

The trenches, part of Kibbutz Dan's pre-1967 system of fortifications, are militarily irrelevant now that Israel is in possession of the Golan. Since its 1975 disengagement agreement with Israel, Syria has more or less respected the new lines.

But beyond the orchard, there is a flashpoint, Shabaa Farms (Mt. Dov), that could ignite a war. Although Mt. Dov is technically Syrian territory and thus part of the Golan, Lebanon has claimed it.

Since Israel's United Nations-sanctioned withdrawal from its self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon in May 2000, Hezbollah has mounted a series of attacks against Israeli army patrols on Mt. Dov, killing three Israeli soldiers so far.

But in the Garden of Eden that is Tel Dan, so near and yet so far from Mt. Dov, the harsh realities of contemporary Middle Eastern politics are kept at bay.

Tel Dan is lovely and quiet. May it be so forever.

Hiking across the Galilean countryside and mountains

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Visitors enjoying Israel's kaleidoscopic sights invariably stick to the usual bill of fare: Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Eilat and the like.

However, they remain blissfully unaware of its natural wonders – the scenic mountains, meadows and gullies of the Galilee in northern Israel – which can best be seen on unhurried, deeply satisfying hikes.

Israel's network of hiking paths, some of the finest of which are found in the vicinity of Haifa and Safed, are tailor-made for travellers drawn to the rural, down-to-earth pleasures of eco-tourism.

To be sure, not everyone is interested in, much less physically capable of, partaking in this sort of activity. But if your spirit is willing and your body is reasonably fit, the Israeli countryside is enormously appealing and ideally suited for adventurous, outdoor souls.

On a sunny spring morning, when the air was refreshingly bracing and the wildflowers were gloriously in bloom, my guide and I set off on a half-day jaunt to discover the charms of Little Switzerland.

Lying in the bucolic Carmel mountain range, cited in the Song of Songs, Little Switzerland offers the best of Israeli flora and fauna: dense Mediterranean forests of gnarled oaks and stately Aleppo pines and indigenous wildlife consisting of, among other birds and animals, egrets and owls and gazelles and foxes.

The ruins of a Second Temple synagogue on Mt. Meron. [Sheldon Kirshner photos]

Within sight of the campus of Haifa University, Little Switzerland is a tranqil haven far from the madding crowds and, in light of Israel's current security problem, perfectly safe. As I immersed myself in its gently rolling beauty, the intifadah seemed like an unreal phenomenon.

Hewing to a marked trail known as Kellah-Galim, Nahum (Neil) Eisenstadt – my American-born licensed tour guide – and I began our hike in a dimly-lit gully entangled with trees, bushes and creepers. It was positively primeval.

Passing the remnants of a Crusader bridge, we clambered over boulders and carefully slid down limestone rock formations. My fitness, such as it is, was tested to the hilt.

Under an increasingly hot sun, Nahum and I traversed a field of prickly thorns. I scratched my legs and thorns stuck to my boots, but I soldiered on.

As we emerged from the depths of a cool oak forest close to Kibbutz Beit Oren, clinging airily on a hillside, we reached a two-lane road. We met our driver, and he took us to Daliyat el-Karmil, a bustling Druze village famed for its markets and restaurants.

On day two, Nahum and I hiked from Mt. Meron– Israel's highest peak at 1,200 metres – to Safed by way of Nahal Miron and Nahal Ammud.

As we walked down the mountain, which was clad in a mantle of thick greenery, we stopped to examine the ruins of a village called Hirbat Bak. This picturesque area was settled by the Israelites under Joshua, by the Romans and, in the 19th century, by Jews fleeing a devastating earthquake in Safed.

Amid fragrant fields of sage, marjoram and oregano, and within view of an Israeli army camp and the Druze village of Beit Jann, we passed Roman wine and olive presses, terraced vineyards cultivated by local farmers, and a memorial honouring a Druze soldier killed in southern Lebanon in 1992.

At Hirbet Shema, Nahum pointed out the striking ruins of a Second Temple synagogue, the grounds of which were strewn with the shards of ancient pottery.

Damaged by an earthquake in 306 CE, the shul was rebuilt, then destroyed by yet another earthquake. Eric Meyers, a Duke University archeologist, excavated it in the early 1970s.

The tomb of the renowned rabbinical sage, Shimon Bar Yochai, lies within about an hour's walking distance of the synagogue.

One of the leaders of the Bar Kokhba revolt against the Romans, he was a charismatic ascetic whose teachings inspired the writing of the Zohar, the great Kabbalistic work. During the month of May, on Lag b'Omer, religious Jews converge by the tens of thousands on Mt. Meron to consecrate his legacy.

From Bar Yochai's tomb, we descended into Nahal Miron, filled with a profusion of bright yellow broomwood bushes. As we hiked along the Israel Trail, which extends from Metulla to Eilat, we saw abandoned flour mills and springs.

In Nahal Ammud, we followed the course of the Ammud River, which is really a stream by North American standards.

Majestic plane trees hundreds of years old towered over the river, letting in dappled rays of sunshine. Here and there, vocal teenagers bursting with joie de vivre frolicked in shallow pools.

The path we were on brimmed with wild sabras and grapes, lending Nahal Ammud a homey, agrarian feel.

We finished the hike with a fairly strenuous ascent to Safed, walking through its old Jewish cemetery before reaching Safed's fabled artist's quarter.

A typical vista in Little Switzerland on Mt. Carmel.

Overgrown with thorns, the cemetery is the final resting place of revered rabbis and of Irgun militia fighters executed by the British in 1947.

With dusk only an hour and a half away, Nahum and I peeked into the Joseph Karo synagogue, a marvel of architecture and a repository of Torah scrolls from pre-Inqusition Spain.

As I tried to read a mottled scroll in the fading light, Little Switzerland and Mt. Meron seemed far away, both in terms of space and time.

It had been quite an adventure.

"In 1984, we took out a $1 million dollar loan to build a new factory. A year later, in July 1985, the debt doubled overnight."

Peleg also remembers those days because the kibbutz reached the pinnacle of its membership with 215 members. Fifteen years later, 110 remain, including 15 over the age of 85.

Immediately after the financial collapse, Hulda took measures to save money. It stopped paying electricity fees collectively, transferring responsibility to the individual members; stopped paying grants to youngsters who left the kibbutz to start a new life elsewhere; and for four years, it prohibited its members from travelling abroad.

The economic restrictions, the sudden drop in living standards and the huge debt which Hulda had piled up convinced many of the younger members to leave.

"Kibbutz members received less and less all the time until they came to the conclusion there was no future," Peleg says. "Then they got up and left."

Though Zachs did not abandon Givat Brenner, the decline in purpose and status coupled with the economic woes of the kibbutz shook him to the core.

"I began to feel that I was a sucker," Zachs says. "Here I was working so hard while others had time to visit friends and do all kinds of things. I used to take it for granted that that was the way it things were. That some do and other don't do. I like to work. But at some point, I started to tell myself that I wouldn't be a sucker any longer.

"Furthermore, when I looked around and compared myself to my peers who had left the kibbutz or my army friends, I saw there was a difference. They had a house, a car or two, a trip each year abroad. I looked at myself. Here I had been working for 20 or 30 years and felt I hadn't gotten anywhere. My sense of purpose was gone. All I had left as a reference point was the outside world to see how far they had come and how far I had come. I came to the realization that our life was inferior."

At Hulda, the privatization measures were the first attempts to keep the kibbutz solvent. Each year it was saddled with enormous interest payments on its NIS 130 million (over $30 million) debt.

During the 1990s, the kibbutz dining hall gradually shut down. At first, it stopped serving evening meals. Then it stopped serving breakfast. In 1995, the kibbutz started charging a fee for lunch, and then stopped cooking and handed over the dining hall to a private caterer. When members stopped showing up for lunch, the kibbutz shut down the dining room altogether.

In Hulda's case, Peleg says, the dining hall's closure reflected social changes on the kibbutz. Most members preferred eating at home. In other kibbutzim, the decision was largely financial and caused greater emotional disruption.

For armchair socialists and urban nostalgiasts, the idea of paying for meals or not taking them collectively is a shocking sign of the demise of the kibbutz. But Peleg does not agree. The principle of equality was not affected by the changes in the dining hall, he says. Instead of free meals, each kibbutz member was given an equal supplement to his personal budget to buy food.

Still, Peleg does not deny that the dining hall had played a cultural role in kibbutz communal life.

"There are many things that no longer exist that I am sad about," he says. "But these things happened and will continue to happen… I am not a prisoner of nostalgia. You must always see what is the best thing to do in any given situation."

Privatization saved money. According to Zachs, Givat Brenner saved one million shekels by closing its dining hall. Hulda, a fifth the size of Givat Brenner, saved half a million shekels.

According to kibbutz researcher Menachem Topel, privatization was not only a matter of economy. It also offered kibbutz members more personal freedom. As a result, the itemized budget of previous years increasingly gave way to a general budget which allowed members to determine their own priorities.

In the past, for example, the kibbutz paid for trips abroad and allowed each member to travel once in 20 or 25 years. Today, kibbutzim have taken the money once set aside to enable a handful of families to travel each year, divided it equally and added it to the personal budgets of its members. Kibbutz members can travel abroad as frequently as they wish, provided they stay within their overall budget. Nevertheless, for all the increased efficiency and personal liberation of privatization, the reforms hardly made a dent in the kibbutz deficits.

Both Zachs and Peleg came to realize that the core of the problem lay elsewhere: in the organization of work, the slackness of some kibbutz members, the lack of incentive to work hard, and the inability of the kibbutz as a collective to enforce a work ethic on recalcitrant members.

Zachs ran for the position of kibbutz secretary with the intention of scrapping the old work system and introducing capitalism. "I reached the conclusion that until a person works for himself, he will not work hard," he says.

At Hulda, Peleg had reached the same conclusion. He had seen kibbutz members who didn't work at all, or who worked a few hours for the kibbutz and then went off and earned money on the side which they kept for themselves. He had seen three people doing one person's work just for the sake of having something to do.

"The concealing of income, the parasitism, the waste and the inefficiency would have ultimately destroyed Hulda," Peleg says. "Hulda would simply have ceased to exist."

Five months ago, after determining the salary value and time-efficiency of every job on the kibbutz, Hulda introduced a system of differential incomes. Every member must contribute a share of his income to the social, health, educational and other collective services of the kibbutz. The kibbutz also guarantees a minimum income to those who cannot make it on their own. Other than that, says Peleg, "for every individual, the sky is the limit."

Every member must contribute a share of his income to the social, health, educational and other collective services of the kibbutz

The members keep their own net salaries and are encouraged to find work outside the kibbutz, where wages are frequently higher. Furthermore, the kibbutz is no longer responsible for finding or creating jobs for its members.

Givat Brenner will soon be introducing the same system. Both kibbutzim have also separated business aspects from communal aspects. Each economic sector is responsible for itself and functions on a purely economic basis, putting the interests of the business before the interests of the community. Sector managers have much greater autonomy than ever before.

After only five months, Peleg believes the system is a success. The kibbutz may be disappearing as a collective settlement, but for the first time in 15 years, Hulda's youth is showing signs that it wants to stay, he says.

As for Zachs, he believes that the greatest achievement of the new system is not economic but psychological.

"Our first aim is to make to make the members of the kibbutz responsible for themselves as human beings," he says. "It was never like that before. It was always the kibbutz that was responsible. We believe, say, that every member will know how to cope. Maybe we will have to help at first because many kibbutz members have never lived independently. In the end, however, each one will know better than anyone else what is best for him."

Israel's technological help for foreign farmers

By LILY KUTNER

After reading and hearing constant, unjustified criticism of Israel in the media, it was heartwarming to read positive news from Jerusalem, in the Forward, the New York Yiddish newspaper.

Agricultural science in Israel is helping farmers in other countries fight the growing hunger problem, especially in the developing countries of Africa, the newspaper reported.

Last year, Israel educated 1,400 foreign agricultural experts and organized courses in 50 countries. The country also participated in 100 projects in Russia.

Israel's expertise in agriculture grew from the beginning of the 19th century, when the pioneers revived the desolate land, cleared the rocks, dried the swamps, built terraces on hills and washed salt from the soil.

Nowadays, the agricultural sector is based primarily on scientific technology, which is used in genetically engineered plants, especially those in the desert and other places where the water supply is scarce.

A special system of drop watering, which directs the stream to the roots of plants, was developed by engineers at the Technion Institute in Haifa, and is now used worldwide.

Scientists of Ben-Gurion University in Beersheva revived a method used 2,000 years ago, when the Negev farmers used to build low-brick walls to keep the rainwater. The same system, which results in a great saving of water, is being used now for watering fields. It doesn't demand great technological expertise or expensive equipment.

Negev farmers used to build low-brick walls to keep the rainwater

As well, because of the growing hunger in the world, the technologists of the Weizmann Institute in Rehovot and the Technion in Haifa are working intensely to increase the harvest and improve the quality of essential foods, such as a kind of wheat which produces a harvest 40 percent greater than the one produced by the existing method.

In addition, Israeli and American scientists have joined forces to invent new vegetables and cereals that possess protein now found only in meat or fish. This is a great production system for poor farmers, who don't have the resources or expertise.

Another production system developed by the Ben-Gurion University is the African market garden, which produces vegetables and fruit with high-quality calories. For example, the date tree, which loves the heat, grows fruit that can be eaten fresh or dried.

The Ben-Gurion specialists are also engaged in educating African farmers in Uganda, Ethiopia, Mali and Nigeria.

Israel's efforts to help developing nations feed their people, is clearly helping people around the world.

Lily Kutner lives in Toronto.

No good place to rest my head

By ESTHER HECHT
Special to The CJN

When Erna (Esther) Sachs died in Jerusalem this spring, she was laid to rest in a plot next to that of her husband, Arieh.

To ensure this, she bought her plot when he died in 1980.

But such accommodations are becoming rare in Israel. So when Isidor Langerman's wife is buried in Haifa, they will lie in the same grave.

The land crunch in Israel, with 6.4 million inhabitants in an area about the size of New Jersey, has made it one of the mostly densely populated countries in the world. This squeeze is forcing planners to come up with new solutions for burying the dead.

Just how critical the problem is can be seen from the burial needs of greater Tel Aviv. Because zoning restrictions limit the size of cemeteries and use of the land around them, conventional field burial over the course of one lifetime (75 years) would require more than 10 square miles, or half the area of the city. In just one lifetime, there would be no more room for the living.

The problem is most acute among the country's Jews – about 81 percent of the population – because of the religion's requirements, says Jerusalem architect Uri Ponger.

"In Judaism, a grave is 'forever;' that is, until the coming of the Messiah, because the body itself will be resurrected, with all its bones and organs, and until then must repose in nature," Ponger explains.

Large cities in Europe have found partial solutions to their burial problems by leasing graves for fixed periods and then reusing them if the lease is not renewed. In Israel, neither this nor cremation is an option. So Ponger and Tel Aviv-based architect Tuvia Sagiv have found ways to solve the problem, encouraged by a recent decision by national planners that urban cemeteries built on state land must allow for higher burial density.

"There are many historic precedents for dense Jewish burial in Eretz Yisrael," Ponger says. In the third century CE, Beit She'arim in lower Galilee became a central burial place for Jews of the area and from the Diaspora, who were laid to rest in catacombs cut into the soft rock. Jerusalem, too, had a giant necropolis, with burial in niches.

Such burial was considered far more dignified than field burial, which was reserved for paupers, Ponger says.

In modern times, Israel's first dense burials took place about eight years ago. "There is a psychological barrier," Ponger admits, but in the past year over 2,500 people have been buried like this.

The architects' simplest solutions include burial of two family members in a single grave that is dug an extra three feet deep.

But their most important innovation – one they say is unique – is the multi-level cemetery. It allows for single and double conventional graves, as well as niche burial, on at least two levels. In combination, these burial methods allow for a quadrupling of burial density.

At the same time, the landscaped outer slope of multi-level cemeteries makes them esthetically pleasing green areas. In the existing Yarkon cemetery, north of Tel Aviv, for example, Ponger and Sagiv have redesigned the periphery for dense burial so its landscape will flow into that of the adjacent Yarkon River Park.

A more ambitious design is a vast new cemetery cluster in Bareket, 10 miles east of Tel Aviv. Built in stages, with burial to begin by 2004, it is to transform the eyesore of a disused quarry into a lush green area, while meeting the burial needs of Tel Aviv and surrounding areas for the next 30 years.

In keeping with a recent ruling of Israel's High Court of Justice, 10 percent of the new cemeteries will be allocated for non-Orthodox burial, to accommodate both secular Israelis who do not want a religious ceremony and those whose burial today is problematic because their Jewishness is in doubt.

"But no crosses will be allowed on the graves in this section," Ponger says.

To gain approval for their designs from the Chief Rabbinate, which controls burial practices, Ponger and Sagiv had to meet strict religious requirements. Though there is no prohibition against burial in tiers and no limitation on the number of tiers, each body must rest on soil and there must be 21 to 22 inches between bodies in every direction. This space may include concrete, but may not be all concrete.

In multi-level burial, one side of each level must be in contact with a natural extension of the ground (for example the slope of a hill, the side of a cave or the wall of a quarry).

The two architects started working on dense burial independently and reached solutions as different from each other as the two men's lifestyles.

Sagiv, born in Belgium in 1947, comes from a religious background and studied at Haifa's Technion, the Israel Institute of Technology. Ponger, born in Israel in 1936, is secular, and studied at Vienna Technical University and Karlsruhe Technical University in Germany.

"It was the Religious Affairs Ministry that made the 'shidduch' between us," Ponger says.

Sagiv started thinking about solutions in the mid-'80s, when public opposition to a new cemetery in north Tel Aviv, on the most expensive real estate in the country, reached its peak.

"I remembered from Jewish sources that you can bury in tiers," he says. "I started collecting material and built models."

Encouraged by the Israel Lands Administration, which is interested in reclaiming problematic tracts like disused quarries, the architects have designed cemeteries or cemetery extensions from Acre in the north to Beersheva in the south.

Although development costs are higher for dense burial, Ponger says, "when land value is factored in, it is more economical than field burial."

Tribute to Israel

Despite the odds, a tree grows in Israel

By ANN SZEDLECKI
Special to The CJN

The war between Israel and the Arabs in 1967 began on the sixth day of the sixth month and lasted six days. When you add this number, you arrive at the figure 18. In gematria – Jewish numerology – that is the number symbolizing life.

Israel's victory, which came at the cost of thousands killed and wounded, saw a miracle that enabled us to continue to exist in spite of everything.

I recently arrived in Israel for a visit. The line-up at the Toronto airport was small, but it was still early and more people arrived. After I boarded, I was happy to see most of the seats were taken.

Almost 11 hours later we arrived, greeted by a beautiful, sunny day. The bus took us to the terminal to go through passport control and baggage claim. It turned out, to my great disappointment, that most of the passengers were Israelis returning home. There were only about 10 or so lined up at the foreign passport check-in. How pathetic! In the hour it took for our baggage to arrive, no other planes landed, only one carousel was operating and hundreds of buggies lined up were not used.

My emotions vacillated between sadness and anger. I kept asking myself what happened to our spirit, displayed heroically by the Warsaw Ghetto fighters, partisans and other brave Jews throughout the ages. Why are we staying away in droves, when this country needs our support now? Aren't we the same people?

However, as the saying goes, we cannot put our head on somebody else's shoulder.

As soon as I got into a taxi to go to my destination, I looked around. Things looked exactly the same as they have on my many previous trips. Traffic was bumper to bumper during the early morning rush. Construction, green fields… life was going on as it should.

* * *

The housing complex where my friend lives is more than 40 years old, with many tenants. A bus stop in front of her main-floor apartment keeps discharging passengers from sunup to sundown.

Leaning against the glass bus shelter, a bush with pale pink flowers manages to grow despite its state of dusty neglect. Somehow it survives, and I draw a parallel to life in Israel.

Endless traffic travels in both directions; motorists, including bus drivers, largely ignore the speed bumps on the road. The ones that notice them try to slow down, but by then it's too late. The huge trucks going over these obstacles create a noise like an explosion, rattling the windows and dishes in my friend's apartment. Some cars have a flag flying from their antennae.

I guess there is not much joy after what happened at the Tel Aviv disco, when so many young people lost their lives, including the suicide bomber. Yet in the early afternoon everything looks so normal. I sit on the terrace and people-watch. Some are buying groceries, newspapers and bread.

Across the road, kids are racing home from school. I hope and pray that their future is going to be safe, but they have to be on guard always, with no one else to rely on but themselves. Their backpacks are a prelude to the heavy burden they will one day have to bear.

I see young mothers wheeling carriages and strollers. Across from my friend's apartment, I see multi-storied apartment buildings, humming with the sound of the air conditioners that adorn every window. Over the din, the sound of the long tone signals to all Israelis to listen to the latest news on the radio.

Every hour, the sound of the broadcast resonates throughout the entire neighbourhood and beyond, from the cabs to the buses. Now it is drowned out by the sound of a single jumbo jet flying overhead, and I pray that it is filled with tourists so that we can show this beautiful country what we Jews in the Diaspora are really made of. Perhaps my prayers will be answered. Perhaps not.

Ann Szedlecki, 76, has been a Toronto resident since 1953. Born in Lodz, Poland, she survived World War II when her parents sent her to Russia in 1939 at the age of 14. Her entire family was murdered by the Nazis.

Tribute to Israel

Yeshiva-trained Chassid is a martial arts pro

By WENDY ELLIMAN
Israel Press Service

There are Irish and Italians in Brooklyn and Germans in Germany who have met Yehoshua Sofer the hard way. Groups of young thugs who have attacked the slightly built Chassid with collar-length peyot dangling from under his white knitted cap quickly found themselves thrown off like the bad guys in a Bruce Lee movie.

Sofer is the world's only non-Asian master of the Korean martial art Kuk Sool Won, and the only person in Israel authorized to teach it.

Soft-spoken,with intense blue eyes, Sofer, 42, effortlessly reconciles lifestyles that appear contradictory, wholly maintaining the integrity of both. For him, there is no conflict.

"I believe only in the Torah," he says. "Kuk Sool is just a system of martial arts techniques. It has no philosophy. But it can make a difference to the lives of men, women and children by giving them strength, confidence and inner balance."

As both a yeshiva-educated Chassid and a sixth-degree black belt in Kuk Sool Won, Sofer's credentials are flawless. Scion of a Breslov family that traces its lineage to the brother of Rabbi Nachman of Breslov, he has studied Torah all his life. He is also among the elite of Kuk Sool practitioners alive today, a pupil of its Korean founder and grand master Suh In Hyuk, and accredited by Korea's prestigious Dae Han Kido Hae Association – his picture conspicuous amid the Asian faces in its album of acknowledged masters.

The two lifestyles first came together in Jamaica, where the strictly Orthodox Sofers moved for two years from the United States when Yehoshua was five.

It was soon after moving to Jamaica that the young Sofer met an elderly Chinese in a Kingston parking lot.

"At first he thought I was Chinese too," remembers Sofer. "He had a ponytail, I had peyot. He wore a cap, and I wore a kippah."

It was this man who taught five-year-old Yehoshua his first Eastern fighting skills. When the Sofers relocated to Los Angeles two years later, Yehoshua began classes in Tang Soo Do, a Korean form of karate – on condition that he study extra Gemarah and Mishnah on Shabbat.

He proved a natural, achieving his black belt at age 10. Eight years later, he was looking for something more challenging when grand master Suh In Hyuk brought one of the most complex martial arts to the United States.

Incorporating 3,608 ancient tribal and royal court fighting techniques, Kuk Sool Won cultivates physical and mental strength and well-being through meditation, breathing techniques and traditional Asian medicine (acupressure and acupuncture), as well as through kicking, joint locks, throwing and grappling.

As his mastery of Kuk Sool grew, Sofer worked as a bodyguard, as a sparring partner for kick-boxers and, after moving to Israel in 1989, as an instructor to elite Israeli military units. Four years ago, he opened his school in Jerusalem.

Dressed in a black uniform embroidered with red Korean script, he teaches men, women and children from every kind of background. A natural mimic and a gifted teacher, Sofer holds separate classes for yeshiva students and for women.

Women?

"I feel obligated to teach women," he says. "I teach techniques that can save lives. How can I withhold such knowledge?"

Gravity poses no problem for Yehoshua Sofer as he makes his way through Mahane Yehuda. [IPS photo]

Aware that his piety attracts some students and repels others, Sofer takes pains to make everyone comfortable.

"It's OK," he reassures a haredi youngster, uneasy with the command to bow to the flags of Israel and Korea hanging on the dojang wall. "It's a sign of respect, not worship. It's permitted." The discipline Sofer teaches is, he stresses, about self-defence, not violence.

"If an attack comes from another person, Kuk Sool says: 'Receive it gently, harmonize with their will, turn it into a circle, and use it to your advantage,'" he says. "The greatest thing I learned from Kuk Sool is to roll with the punches that come from Heaven, harmonize with the Divine Will, and flow with it."

Cantor's voice saved his life more than once

BY JULIA KOLLEK
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Cantor Henry Zimmerman, who died recently at the age of 91, had an extraordinary voice that literally saved his life on more than one occasion.

Obituary

Growing up in Poland, Zimmerman was a child cantor in the main synagogue in Warsaw, where he was taught in the tradition of the great cantors of the time.

Zimmerman was injured during World War II, but miraculously survived. With the Russians invading Poland, he was caught in crossfire and was shot below the chest under the diaphragm. The bullet did not penetrate the muscle because it was so well developed from his training as a singer.

Furthermore, the driver of a passing tank happened to be Jewish; he rescued Zimmerman and saved his life.

Zimmerman's voice saved the day on yet another potentially dangerous occasion. He was singing in a synagogue, when two German soldiers with guns entered. They stood as Zimmerman sang and listened until the concert was over. Then they turned and left the building.

After the war, Zimmerman found he had lost his entire immediate family – his parents and eight brothers and sisters. He ultimately immigrated to Halifax and then moved to Montreal, where he lived for several years.

When he was invited to sing at a wedding there, he met a young woman, Helen Turk, who was in the wedding party. The couple was married three months later.

Helen shared her husband's love of music. Before Zimmerman had learned much English, he was asked to sing a popular song at a wedding. To enable him to perform, Helen transliterated the lyrics, writing them out for him to learn.

His reputation grew and he became known for his expressive voice. Although he was unable to read music, Zimmerman was able to commit to memory prayers and melodies, as well as his favourite operatic arias.

In 1954, Zimmerman was invited to be cantor at the Beth Jacob Synagogue in Hamilton, a job he held for more than 20 years.

"He had a marvelous voice," said Rabbi Israel Silverman, who was spiritual leader at the synagogue during Zimmerman's time there. "He was a decent soul, a colourful person. Everyone knew him and had a great affection for him. Often he would call people on the phone, and if the mood took him, he would belt out an aria."

Henry and Helen Zimmerman had a son, Shaya, and a daughter, Miriam.

"There was always music in the house," Miriam said. "There would be everything, from the music my mother loved – Perry Como and Connie Francis – to opera, La Bohème, Tosca and Madame Butterfly. It was a wonderful way to grow up."

Henry Zimmerman dies at age 93

Zimmerman was always singing, and the windows of the house would be open for the neighbours to hear while he practised, Miriam recalled, adding that her father would serenade anyone who came to do work at the house.

"A member of our congregation was a plumber, and every time he came, even to put in a new washer on a tap, he would request a song, and you could hear them up in the bathroom." To everyone's amusement, one of the family dogs would howl in accompaniment whenever he sang.

The family home became a focus for youngsters learning for their bar and bat mitzvahs and Zimmerman had a reputation as a patient and excellent teacher. If someone had been bereaved and did not know how to say kaddish or morning prayers, he would take the time to teach them. Each week he would visit those in hospital and would even come back early from family vacations if he was needed.

When Zimmerman retired in 1978, the new cantor, David Bercovici, was anxious about taking on his role. "It was not easy to follow him, but we understood each other."

There was mutual respect between the two men and they became good friends.

Zimmerman was widowed shortly after he retired. He is survived by son Shaya and his wife Jennifer and their son Adam, and daughter Miriam and her husband Norman Shogilev and their son Daniel.

Mideast deaths mourned

By MARLANE PRESS
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER – Clothed in black from head to toe, some 60 women and a handful of men recently gathered to mourn the deaths of both Israelis and Palestinians.

In response to the escalating violence currently enveloping Israel, local supporters of Women for a Just Peace in Palestine and Israel, an Israel-based group, stood on the northern grounds of the Vancouver Art Gallery holding signs and placards that read, "End the Occupation" and "End the Violence."

Passers-by during the downtown core's bustling, five o'clock rush hour were handed pamphlets promoting peace in the region. A couple of drivers honked their horns and waved, showing their support of the vigil.

Hedy Ghattas, a Palestinian originally from Jerusalem, wiped away her tears, saying she was worried about how many more bodies would be counted before the violence in Israel ends. Although a Canadian resident for 29 years, Ghattas said her heart remains in Jerusalem, as do many of her relatives, including her mother.

"I love Canada, but all these years I would rather be there in Jerusalem," she said. "But not right now. It's so sad. I cry for both sides because we're all human beings and we have to stop killing each other."

Involved in the Vancouver chapter of the women's peace coalition for the past eight years, Ghattas said she wanted to show Vancouverites that the Jewish and Palestinian people have many things in common, that they can speak with one another, and, above all, that they can be friends.

Overcome with emotion, the soft-spoken women wiped her eyes. "Don't make me cry," she whispered. "I'm just so very scared."

Standing beside her was Reena Lazar, a member of the Palestinian and Jewish Women's Dialogue Group for Peace, who said her group's primary mandates during the afternoon's silent vigil were to mourn the tragedy of all the people who have died in Israel and to promote peace in the region.

"The vigils are a silent testament to the need to end the occupation and the violence," she said. "Our Vancouver-based group of Palestinian and Jewish women have been meeting for eight years, working together for understanding and toward removing barriers between our communities."

A recent nominee for the 2001 Nobel Peace Prize, Women in Black is an informal movement of women who have stood in vigils throughout Israel for more than a decade to protest the occupation and violence.

Housecleaning of our own

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

With Parliament in summer recess, there is an instinctive inclination to bring closure to files and issues that have been sitting about for a while. Always ready to take a lead from our lawmakers, we have some housecleaning of our own to do – things that were raised in some form or another over the last few months that should be laid to rest.

Some time ago, we wrote about the turf war between Carolyn Bennett and Bill Casey. Casey, the foreign affairs critic for the Tories, undertook an initiative to bring Palestinian and Israeli parliamentarians together in Canada to dialogue and help bring the peace talks back on track. Bennett, the president of the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Friendship Group, was upset that Casey was making a partisan issue out of something that had always enjoyed cross-party support.

Well, after a series of squabbles, the two have worked out a solution that addresses all concerns. They have formed a steering committee (committees being the preferred parliamentary solution to any problem!) so that everyone – including Bennett's Arab-group counterpart, Sarkis Assadourian – can feel like a full and legitimate partner in the exercise. All's well that ends well. Too bad, however, that all of this effort will have been for naught.

The chances of this confab, scheduled to take place in Halifax later this year, are as good as the chances of the current Middle East ceasefire holding.

On a related topic, activist MP Irwin Cotler is apparently increasingly concerned about the orientation of his government's point-man on foreign affairs. As I've noted in columns past, it was widely believed that Manley routinely sought and received advice from Cotler on a number of files. However, it appears that as Cotler became more vocal and implicitly critical of the government's spotty approach to human rights in places like China (not to mention its overall policy on the Middle East), Manley began to place some distance between himself and the internationally-acclaimed lawyer. If previous summer recesses are any indication, the next few months will be especially busy for the globetrotting MP. His statements will provide a good clue as to the nature of his current relationship with Manley.

Finally, the Senate bid farewell to one of its most beloved members, Erminie Cohen. She was appointed to the Senate by Brian Mulroney eight years ago and represented the province of New Brunswick. In a tribute last week, an almost unheard of 16 colleagues rose in the Senate to sing her praises and lament her departure. She was regarded as the Senate's conscience for her unremitting concern for the poor and disadvantaged and always served with great pride as a Jew and as a woman. We wish Erminie well as she moves on to other pursuits back home in Saint John.

Italian Jews divided on new Berlusconi government

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — Italian Jews are sharply divided over the new centre-right government headed by media tycoon Silvio Berlusconi that includes two controversial politicians with far-right links.

Berlusconi, whose Freedom House coalition swept the centre-left from power in general elections last month, was sworn in last week as prime minister of Italy's 59th government since 1945.

"Like Italians at large, Italian Jews voted for both sides," said Amos Luzzatto, president of the Union of Italian Jewish Communities, Italian Jewry's umbrella organization.

In part, Jewish voters were torn between concern over Israel and domestic issues such as racism and anti-fascism.

On the one hand, Berlusconi's new administration probably will be the most pro-Israel government in Italy in years. Defence Minister Antonio Martino, for example, is vice president of the Italian Friends of Israel association.

Many Italian Jews were also drawn to Berlusconi's promise of lower taxes.

On the other hand, in addition to his own business-oriented Forza Italia Party, Berlusconi's coalition includes political forces that many Jews deeply distrust.

These include the National Alliance, which has its roots in neo-fascism, and the Northern League, which once aimed to separate northern Italy from the rest of the country and is known for its overt anti-immigrant policies.

National Alliance leader Gianfranco Fini is now Berlusconi's deputy prime minister, and the Northern League's hot-tempered leader, Umberto Bossi, renowned for his rabble-rousing behaviour, is a cabinet minister in charge of reforms.

Political divisions in Italian Jewry are paralleled in the conflicting views of two of the country's most prominent Jewish leaders: Luzzatto and Cobi Benatoff, a Milan businessman who once headed the Milan Jewish community and is now president of the European Council of Jewish Communities.

As chief lay leader of all 35,000 Italian Jews, Luzzatto, a scholar and doctor, did not urge Jews to vote for a particular party. In his statements before the election, however, he stressed what he called "strong moral values" that voters should bear in mind, including minority rights and the need to combat racism.

Luzzatto's personal sympathies are clearly with the left.

In particular, he strongly distrusts National Alliance leader Fini despite the fact that, for years, Fini has tried to shake off his party's neo-fascist associations and turn it into a mainstream right-wing force.

"I'm sorry to say that the National Alliance has not yet completed its transition," Luzzatto said. "I need to hear from Fini explicit words that recognize the moral and political responsibility of fascism in the extermination of the Jews. When he does that, I'll even shake his hand."

Bossi, he said, was just as much of a concern – maybe more so.

Luzzatto also noted that members of the Northern League have close relations with far-right Austrian politician Jorg Haider. "Haider is spending more and more time in Italy," Luzzatto said. "What does he want here?"

Israel, meanwhile, will not protest the inclusion of far-right parties in the Italian government, as it did when Haider's party joined the Austrian government last year.

"We have a lot of friends in this government," said Amos Vidan, currently in charge of the Israeli embassy in Rome. "Democratic elections were held and we do not intervene in the process. The party of Bossi is a legitimate party in Italy… we don't boycott it."

Sources in Israel said they could not rule out the possibility that Fini would be offered an invitation for an official visit – depending on the European Union's stance on Fini's role in the Italian government.

"Israel should not be the first to host him, but he should not be rejected off-hand, and the matter should be considered seriously," Vidan said. "Fini is not a product of the fascist era, and we believe that there is room to view him in a different light."

Businessman Benatoff also welcomes the new political lineup.

"I have a lot of hope in the new government," he said. "The people in power have a more sympathetic approach to Israel, especially Berlusconi himself."

Benatoff feels that Jews should accept the National Alliance's overtures in good faith.

"I do not believe that the National Alliance is an anti-Semitic party," he said. "The National Alliance is on the road to normalization and is keen to normalize its relations with the Jews."

PM to Annan: No Peres-Arafat meeting

By AMNON BARZILAI
Ha'aretz daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM – There is concern in the Prime Minister's Office that the presence of UN Secretary General Kofi Annan in the region last week signalled the start of a new initiative based on UN and European efforts to help Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat.

In his discussions with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and MK Yossi Beilin, Annan raised the idea of a multi-faceted program that he thinks could improve the climate of confidence between Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

The first element would be the establishment of a team to supervise the implementation of the ceasefire. Annan argued that the PA and Israel both had complaints about each other's implementation of the Tenet plan, but that neither side could serve as an objective judge. He suggested that the United States head the supervisory committee, but some interpreted his intentions to mean that the Europeans would also be involved.

A second element would be to establish a time framework so that both sides would know when talks on a final status agreement would begin.

A third element would be creating a permanent third party presence in the area, most likely American.

The fourth element raised by Annan was a Peres-Arafat meeting. He told Sharon at the prime minister's residence last Saturday night that a Peres-Arafat meeting was needed to allay Arafat's concerns that Israel was trying to topple him, and to give him good reason to enforce the ceasefire in full.

Sharon did not reject the meeting in principle. "I'm in favour of meetings," the prime minister told Annan. "They are good, but not in the current situation with Arafat not implementing the ceasefire. Any such meeting would give him a good excuse why not to enforce the ceasefire."

Sharon said he suspected Arafat's entire purpose in a meeting would be for the photo opportunity to show his people that despite everything, Israel was conducting political negotiations with the Palestinians, while under fire and on Arafat's terms.

"Therefore," Sharon told Annan, "it's a matter of timing and the meaning given to the meeting."

In a related development, Annan met with President Moshe Katsav and told him that, thus far, the UN had been unable to get any tangible information about the status of Israeli prisoners held by Hezbollah, but that he would continue making efforts to see the prisoners freed.

Annan also met with former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Maccabiah Games are back on

At the time, Salomon told The CJN "the tenor of the meetings (in Israel) was that you can't put on Games when people are dropping out all over the world."

Bob Spivak, president of Maccabi USA, said the suicide bombing attack that killed 20 young Israelis at a Tel Aviv nightclub was a key factor in prompting athlete cancellations and the trend towards postponement.

With postponement appearing almost certain, events turned 180 degrees following a four-hour conference call that included executives of Maccabi USA and prominent community leaders. Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister Michael Melchior joined Malcolm Hoenlein, executive director of the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations, Charles Bronfman, president of the United Jewish Communities, and others, in attempting to persuade Maccabi USA to reverse course and participate in the Games.

Spivak said the appeal to show solidarity with Israel in a time of conflict had an impact. The ceasefire agreement between Israel and the Palestinian Authority as well as the calming trend there were also factors, he said.

The American decision left Maccabi Canada in a quandary. If they declined to participate in next month's Games, it would be four years – not the one year, with postponement – before the next competition in Israel.

Allen Gerskup, chair of Maccabi Canada's national athletic committee, said that with the decision of the United States to participate, the stage was set for the Games to go ahead as scheduled. Maccabi Canada officials "changed their minds… The United States still pulls a lot of weight," he said.

"I don't think you can go eight years without Games," Gerskup said. "I though it would cause us problems. It would be tough to fund-raise and I thought our credibility would be questioned."

Gerskup said all Maccabi Canada athletes will be contacted and informed of the decision to proceed. They will be made aware of the security situation in Israel and will be briefed on measures being taken to ensure their safety.

Gerskup said he always favoured participation in the Games. "I would go no matter how tough the times were in Israel… But I can't force anyone else to go. Everybody else has to make their own choice. I can't tell parents how to deal with their children."

Neil Rothenberg, coach of the junior girls basketball team, said he was "ecstatic" at the news the Games are on. He acknowledged that the parents of the girls, who range in age from 14 to 16, were concerned about the security situation in Israel but the last time he checked, all 10 players were still going.

George Shermer, coach of the men's volleyball team, said he got shivers when told Maccabi Canada had decided to go ahead. "It was a great feeling."

Shermer said the 11-man team was disappointed when he told them earlier in the week that it appeared the Games were off. "All the players wanted to go."

He said it was unclear yet if they had made other plans for the summer but he planned to take even a reduced team – if the funds are there – as a gesture of solidarity with Israel. The Games "are not about winning; they're about participating," he said.

Gerskup said he expected 200 to 250 of the original roster of 350 athletes will travel to Israel.

Spivak said he expected that perhaps half of the 600-athlete U.S. team will attend the Games. Olympic swimming gold medallist Lenny Krayzelburg – the Games' highest profile athlete – is still scheduled to participate, he said.

Spivak said additional security measures may put a crimp in the post-athletic celebrations, but athletes should still enjoy a quality Maccabiah experience.

Athletes will be offered social and entertainment programs at Maccabiah facilities, but Maccabi officials can't prevent adult sportsmen from visiting other areas of the country, he said.

Maccabi Canada has distributed a four-page "security advisory" which outlines the do's and don'ts for athletes in Israel.

The document outlines common security measures in Israel, such as making sure your baggage is accounted for and alerting police about unattended packages. It also suggests athletes not use public transportation and that they avoid all contact with strangers.

Pioneering medical treatment

Ha'aretz daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL HASHOMER — A woman whose legs were paralyzed in a car accident has regained feeling and some movement in response to a course of injections of white corpuscles last year at Sheba Medical Center at Tel Hashomer Hospital, near Tel Aviv.

The procedure is a co-operative effort by the neurosurgery ward at Tel Hashomer and Prof. Michal Schwartz of the department of neurobiology at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot. Schwartz conducted similar experiments on rats and found that in 70 to 75 percent of cases, the nerves renewed themselves and resumed neurological functioning.

The patient who received the treatment, Melissa Holly, now 20 years old, is an American woman who was paralyzed in a car accident last year. She was found to be a suitable candidate for the procedure after six Israeli patients were rejected.

In her experiments, Schwartz cut the rat's spine in two, and after the macrophages were injected into the lower spine, it began to renew itself. New fibres connected the two parts of the spine, and some weeks later, some rats regained some control over their tails and legs.

Dr. Nachson Kenoller repeated the same procedure on Holly; experts said that the operation's results would be known in 6 to 12 months.

After three months, feeling had returned to Holly's lower body. After five months, she could move her toes. Today, she can move her leg from the knee down. Most importantly, say the doctors, she has regained use of her sphincter muscles; one of the most common causes of death among those with paralysis is blood and urine infections.

Measuring the CBC's ME coverage 'over time'

When the Jewish community expresses concern over certain reports from Neil Macdonald, CBC's Middle East television correspondent, the network's reaction is to point out that, measured "over time," balance is achieved.

In reviewing a recent string of Macdonald's reports, beginning in June with the horrific Tel Aviv disco bombing, we find that in five consecutive broadcasts, he did indeed provide considerable Israeli perspective.

On June 1, the night of the disco attack, Macdonald called it an "unparalleled atrocity," and noted the difficulty Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon faced in maintaining his policy of restraint, especially while "some Palestinians were actually celebrating in the streets of Ramallah."

In subsequent reports, he noted that "the slaughter of innocents has sickened the world [and] hardened international opinion toward the Palestinians and their cause."

Macdonald observed that Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat's call for a ceasefire was "something he has refused to do for eight months," adding that in any event, "most Israelis have long since stopped believing a word he says."

Days later, as Sharon withheld from retaliation for the Tel Aviv attack, Macdonald reported positively that "Israelis have discovered what... Sharon calls the power of restraint. The Israeli foreign ministry told a Knesset committee... that, for the first time since the beginning of this conflict, world opinion is against Yasser Arafat and with Israel."

On June 11, Macdonald reported on the Israeli victims of Palestinian terror attacks. This item was announced as, in effect, a balance to a piece he had done a few weeks earlier on Palestinian victims of IDF gunfire. No effort was made to draw a moral equivalence between Israeli victims of wanton terror and Palestinian victims of Israeli shelling in retaliation for Palestinian violence. But the scenes of the young, maimed casualties were gut wrenching.

However, on June 13, the CBC ran Macdonald's documentary on the controversy surrounding Israel's "assassination policy" of Palestinians suspected of being involved in terrorism. If viewers had not seen the earlier reports, they might have concluded that, once again, Macdonald was targeting Israel.

What must be understood, however, is that while unpleasant, the subject of assassination is a valid one for journalistic consideration, and has, in fact, received a fair amount of attention in Israel's always self-critical society and media.

Unfortunately, even though Macdonald included a substantial number of Israeli voices, he failed to provide sufficient context – the horrific toll that terrorism exacts on Israeli civilians, which leaves little choice but to take "extra-judicial" measures necessary for self-defence.

Macdonald's disapproving, judgmental tone was obvious throughout. So was his attempt to draw a moral equivalence between a car bomb that Israeli agents may have planted to kill a wanted terrorist (who, if in area A under full Palestinian control, is not subject to Israeli arrest) and Palestinian terrorists who deliberately target innocent Israeli civilians.

What would other democracies do if confronted with the daily threats faced by Israelis? What are Israel's alternatives when, in violation of written commitments, Arafat releases terrorists from jail? These are questions Macdonald needs to explore in a documentary that would critically examine Arafat's actions. That would be the best way to achieve balance and fairness overall.

A political force to be reckoned with

By ELIAHU SALPETER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Opinion

A major demographic change is taking place in Western Europe: the number of Muslims is increasing while the number of Jews is on the decline.

This demographic trend has political implications for the status of Jews in Western Europe, but also, in many cases, for the position of Western European countries toward Israel.This change is occurring against the background of the escalating Middle East conflict, which, in itself, is heightening tensions between Jewish and Muslim communities in those countries. It should also be noted that the relations between Western European states and Israel, to a great extent, reflect the desire of those states to improve their ties with the Arab world.

The ever-increasing Muslim presence in the general population of Western European countries is becoming an important political variable, as demonstrated in the recent elections in Great Britain.

From the Jewish standpoint, the growth of the Muslim population in Europe is expressing itself in a rise in the number of anti-Semitic incidents, most of which involve extreme Muslim elements. Since the outbreak of the Al-Aksa intifadah, the number of such incidents in Western Europe has tripled. According to the World Jewish Congress (WJC), not since World War II have there ever been so many violent attacks on individual Jews or on Jewish targets.

Both in Europe and the United States, Jews are becoming increasingly aware of this process and are already openly expressing fear that the trend could have a significant impact on the security of local Jewish communities and their institutions.

In the latter half of the 20th century, a veritable revolution took place in the situation of Muslims in Europe, notes a WJC survey titled The ascendance of Islam in Europe.

The survey, which appeared a few weeks ago, notes that "today, Islam is the fastest-growing religion on the continent, and nearly 20 million people in the EU countries identify themselves as Muslims. Today, European Muslims represent a political force to be reckoned with. If present trends continue, by 2020 Muslims will account for 10 percent of the overall population of Europe."

For example, between 1961 and 2001, the Muslim population of the United Kingdom grew from 82,000 to more than one million. Muslim organizations have initiated campaigns calling for the boycott of Marks & Spencer, arguing that some of the British retailing giant's profits are used to support Israel. In electoral districts with a high percentage of Muslim residents, tens of thousands of leaflets attacking candidates thought to be pro-Israel were distributed on the eve of last week's general election. Out of 21 organizations outlawed by the British Home Office for having ties with terrorist movements, 14 have been Muslim.

Since the end of the Algerian war, French foreign policy has never been overly sympathetic toward Israel. France today has 4.2 million Muslim residents plus hundreds of thousands of illegal Muslim immigrants.

The combination of anti-Semitism and animosity toward Muslims sometimes creates paradoxical relations between Muslims, Jews and the extreme right in Western Europe.

On the one hand, Jews and Muslims do have certain common concerns (such as protection of ritual slaughtering practices), and they often have common enemies as well (such as members of the extreme right). Lord Nazir Ahmed of Rotherham, the first Muslim member of the House of Lords in British parliamentary history, said in the spring of 2000 while visiting Israel as a guest of the WJC that "whenever there is evidence of Islamophobia or hatred against Islam and Muslims, the signs of anti-Semitism are not so far behind."

On the other hand, however, concerning the Middle East, the majority of Muslims and the majority of Jews in Western Europe have very different positions. This basic disagreement sometimes expresses itself in acts of violence. There are already signs that neo-Nazi groups in Western Europe are prepared for an alliance with extreme Muslims against the "common Jewish enemy." There is also an ad hoc coalition of fanatic Muslims, mainly Arabs, and neo-Nazi Holocaust-deniers.

The complex nature of the Muslim-Jewish extreme right "triangle" is exemplified in an article that was published last Saturday by the New Straits Times in Singapore, where the preservation of the status quo between Muslim Malays and Buddhist Chinese is a matter of national survival. The newspaper attacked the head of Germany's Christian Democratic Union, Angela Merkel, for having called on Turkish immigrants to assimilate into German culture as the Jews once did.

The New Straits Times comments that if there is one lesson that Malaysians and immigrants in Germany can learn from the Jewish experience in Germany, it is that assimilation has never saved any community when the tide of racism in the establishment rises. The message of the Holocaust, said the paper, is that the next time gas chambers are built on European soil, their intended victims will be Muslims.

China, Taiwan come together in Haifa

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

HAIFA – Top security officials from China and Taiwan took part in an Israeli security conference last week in Haifa.

The Israel Ministry for Foreign Affairs had asked that the attendance of the Taiwan representative not be made public until after the conference, as China usually tries to exclude Taiwan from international forums, and usually boycotts those it attends.

This time, the Chinese envoy did not protest against the Taiwan representative attending – and the two were even friendly during the convention.

The request for silence was made to avoid intensifying the tension between Israel and China. Relations between these countries have been strained since the Phalcon plane debacle, in which Israel, under American pressure, cancelled a done deal with China last June.

Taiwan complied with Israel's request. "We did not want to embarrass the organizers of the event or the government of Israel. We know Israeli-Chinese relations are very sensitive," a source said.

Representatives of Turkey and Cyprus also attended, as well as top government officials from India, Poland, Albania and Slovenia.

The convention was organized by the Galilee College, which deals with international studies and sponsors conventions in collaboration with the Foreign Affairs Ministry.

As a result of the tension, the Foreign Ministry did not sponsor this event because of the Taiwan representation, but officials from the ministry lectured at the conference.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I have a relative who has a peanut allergy who is coming to visit for a week this summer. I know not to cook or buy anything with actual nuts in it but I am wondering if there are other ingredients that I should be looking out for on packages that may contain nuts.

A. This is an excellent question and I applaud your dilligence at making this relative's visit safe and hospitable. The following are all ingredients that you should avoid serving this person: kernel paste, cacahuete, mandelona, peanuts, ground nuts and peanut oil. You may also want to verify that this person is not also allergic to many members of the peanut family that many peanut allergic individuals are also allergic to. These include things like mustard, sesame seeds, legumes and soy as well as ground nuts, water chestnuts, nutmeg and coconut.

Q. My 14-month-old daughter loves pickles and olives. I find this very unusual. Is it okay to serve these to her?

A. It is fine to offer these foods to your one-year-old as long as they are properly cut up to avoid choking. It is very common for young children to love very salty foods like these. I suspect that is because they are so pleased to finally be eating less bland food than they have been restricted to for most of their first year.

Cohen, Waxman honoured at record-breaking awards night

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Founded on a shoestring budget 13 years ago, the Canadian Jewish Book Awards has finally filled up the roughly 500-seat Leah Posluns Theatre — an achievement that founding chair Adam Fuerstenberg says he has waited years to see.

The 13th annual celebration of Canadian Jewish literature, which took place in the north Toronto venue on June 6, drew a record number of people to watch a record number of prizegivers hand out a record number of prizes.

Although the total cash prizes tally $7,000, a relatively small disbursement in this era of munificent Giller and Orange and Governor-General's literary prizes, there is no question that the Canadian Jewish Book Awards are gaining prestige and clout. This year, for the first time, the awards committee has manufactured a golden seal to be used to adorn the covers of winning entries as they are displayed on bookstore shelves.

That golden seal may have come too late to boost sales of Martin Kaufman's novel, The Possibility of Dreaming on a Night Without Stars, published by Viking. The book, which has been remaindered, is the winner of this year's Martin and Beatrice Fischer First Novel Award.

"It's a lovely first novel," Fuerstenberg says. "Kaufman sets himself a task, and he resolves it beautifully. If he can produce another book like this, he'll get lots of attention."

In his acceptance speech, the Toronto author gave special thanks to The CJN editor Mordechai Ben-Dat "for his very generous review which brought this book to the attention of the Jewish community." He also thanked the Fischer family for their sponsorship of the award.

In previous years the Fischers sponsored the Fiction prize. That the category was altered this year to "First Novel" may reflect the feeling that the entries did not measure up to the high marks of previous winners such as Anne Michaels (Fugitive Pieces) and Lilian Nattel (The River Midnight).

The awards ceremony honoured the late novelist Matt Cohen and the late actor-director Al Waxman for their recent autobiographies, respectively titled Typing: A Life in 26 Keys and That's What I Am. As a highlight of the evening, Andy Barrie, host of CBC's Metro Morning, read a chapter from each book in his trademark mellifluous voice. He also reminisced about both Cohen and Waxman whom he had interviewed on radio.

"It is with great pride that I stand here for my father, whom I dearly miss, to accept this honour," said Matt Cohen's son, Daniel. "Although he never admitted it, I believe he enjoyed accepting prizes."

In accepting the award for Al Waxman, his son Adam said, "Writing this book was a wonderful experience for my father, because it helped him define himself .... When I would ask him about his life, he would say, 'Ah, I don't remember, check my book.' I feel very proud and happy to receive this for him."

More reminiscences about Cohen and Waxman came from author Erna Paris as she accepted the Jewish History prize for her book Long Shadows. In their university days, Waxman and Paris had gone out on a date to a Chinese restaurant, where she had ordered only rice; some 15 years later, he had thanked her for that economical choice, confessing he had been nearly broke back then. "I said, 'I wish I could take the credit, but I just wasn't hungry at the time,'" Paris related.

And she credited Cohen's book The Spanish Doctor with "opening my eyes to Spain's Jewish society" and sparking an interest that ultimately resulted in The End of Days, her own non-fiction book on the Jews of Spain.

As in previous years, Holocaust themes predominated among the winning entries. Prizes went to five Holocaust-related books, as follows:

Franklin Bialystok won the Canadian Jewish History award for Delayed Impact: The Holocaust and the Canadian Jewish Community; editors F.C. DeCoste and Bernard Schwartz won the Holocaust History award for The Holocaust's Ghost; Gitel Donath won the Holocaust Memoir award for My Bones Don't Rest in Auschwitz; Irene N. Watts won the Young Adult Fiction award for Remember Me; and Howard Margolian won the Jewish Scholarship award for Unauthorized Entry: The Truth about Nazi War Criminals in Canada, 1946-1956.

The Biblical Scholarship award went to Barry Dov Walfish for Apples of Gold in Settings of Silver; the World Jewish Culture award went to editor Dorion Liebgott for Art and Tradition; the Yiddish award went to translator Vivian Felson for Montreal of Yesterday; and the Poetry award went to Karen Shenfeld for The Law of Return.

For the first time, the Jewish Theatre Committee of Toronto used the occasion of the Book Awards to honour the winner of its annual playwriting competition. The winning play — Sara's Cave, by Don Molnar — has a Holocaust theme, said committee chair Ralph Wintrob.

"In the 12 years that we've sponsored the contest, we've received scores of scripts, and most have had a Holocaust theme," he said. "It's the most compelling issue of our time."

Steve Koven Trio brings refreshing show to jazz fest

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Local pianist and composer Steve Koven, 37, has gained a steady international following, both as a solo artist and with his band The Steve Koven Trio.

Local jazz buffs can catch the band at Toronto's du Maurier Downtown Jazz at the Crowne Plaza's Trellis Lounge, 225 Front St. W. on June 22, 27, 28 and 29.

The trio will then board the Northern Spirit to headline a jazz dinner cruise.

Fans of jazz around the Oakville area can check out the threesome in concert at the Oakville Jazz Festival at the downtown mainstage in the square, on July 6, from 4 to 5:30 p.m.

At the trio's performances expect to hear standards by Myles Davis, Bill Evans, Ray Henderson, Duke Ellington and Thelonius Monk.

Original compositions will include the title song of their third CD, Not By The Elbows, and Rachael's Waltz, named in honour of Koven's daughter, now 10.

The Steve Koven Trio is currently working on its fourth CD due out next year.

The trio, consisting of Koven, Rob Clutton on bass and Anthony Michelli on drums, has been together since 1995.

The band is currently working on its fourth CD with some special guests; it is due out at the beginning of 2002.

"I've taken this trio internationally in the last few years. We have a refreshing show in which I interact with the audience and tell stories and jokes. It is very entertaining. That is why I like performing live," says Koven.

He has performed as a soloist or with the trio, at a number of jazz festivals, concerts and clubs in Canada, the United States, Europe and the Caribbean.

At the 1987 Barbados Jazz Festival, the trio opened for singer Nancy Wilson.

Koven returns to Barbados on an annual basis, often playing with favourite local musicians. He recently took part in a concert in the Bahamas to raise money to send music students from the island to schools in the United States.

He has been invited back for another concert in September.

In addition, Koven books the Crowne Plaza's Trellis Lounge – the trio appears two weeks out of each month, when in town.

He just completed a musical project with singer Michael Danso for the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University, and he composes for film and television, including the horror film Body Count and the new theme music for CBC Newsworld's Fashion File.

With the help of Canada Council, the group is planning a tour of Japan in the near future.

Koven was born into a musical family. His father Irving, a surgeon at Mount Sinai Hospital, tickled the ivories at a number of upscale restaurants and nightclubs.

"I studied classical music growing up, but never pursued jazz. When I went to York University, I auditioned for a course on experimental improvisation with Casey Sokol.

"After graduation in '87, I played rock n' roll, then I went to a party with a friend and we started playing some jazz standards – just piano and saxophone.

"I got the idea at that point to form a band because I really liked jazz. Then I started studying privately with greats like Benny Green, Geoff Keeser, Bruce Barth, Mark Eisenman and Brian Rudolf."

For a few years Koven's group performed as a quartet.

"We then formed a trio because when you play with more musicians, the piano becomes more of a support to instruments such as the clarinet or saxophone. In a trio, the piano is the primary instrument," he says.

Tickets to the jazz cruise can be purchased at Ticketmaster outlets by phone at 416-870-8000 or at www.ticketmaster.ca.

CORRECTIONS

The story "Roll the tape! – Recording your party in style" (CJN Party Supplement, June 7, page B47) contained inaccuracies. Abe Salzman of Video Affairs has been in business since 1981 and has never been in a partnership with anyone. Also, the story implied that Video Affairs supplies raw footage, when in fact Video Affairs professionally edits the tape and invites customers to participate in the editing.

MEROVITZ MUSICAL OPENS FOR FOUR-WEEK RUN

If Cows Could Fly, Allan Merovitz's musical play about the Jewish-Canadian experience, is returning to Artword Theatre this summer.

Merovitz, a Dora Award-winning actor and klezmer musician, grew up in Smiths Falls, Ont., in a family of chassidic Jews. If Cows Could Fly traces the story of his family from Poland, Lithuania and Kishinev to the tiny community in the Ottawa Valley. The story reflects the Jewish experience worldwide in microcosm, he says.

Since the play was first performed at Artword last February, Merovitz and director Ronald Weihs had been revising it for a production on Prairie Public Television in Winnipeg. When a gap appeared unexpectedly in Artword's summer season, Merovitz and Weihs decided to restage the play, incorporating some of the changes they have been working on for television.

If Cows Could Fly features the two-piece Simcha Klezmer band. Previews June 20, runs June 21 to July 14. $27 - $22. Artword Theatre, 75 Portland St. 416-408-2783.

Painting of Munich Massacre: Iowa artist Carol Barenberg has painted a dramatic three-part painting of the 11 Israeli athletes who were murdered by PLO-sponsored terrorists at the Munich Olympics in 1972. The painting is to be unveiled in Davenport, Iowa, early next month.

Barenberg spent at least two years studying the events surrounding the slaying of the Israelis.

"I have wanted to do this painting since 1972," she said. "I felt it was important to honour the memory of the courageous fighters that these Israelis were. But I struggled with the right way of doing it.

"Finally, I hit on the idea of the triptych, which gave the sense of motion I felt was needed. I didn't think a single painting would have done the athletes justice."

The painting, which is titled, Munich Masacre, 1972, is appearing in the 2001 Bi-State Competitive Art Exhibition, July 7 to Aug. 18, at the Davenport Museum of Art. The artist's Web site is www.barenberg.com.

Fringe Festival: These two plays are among the many being performed as part of the Fringe Festival.

The first focuses on Viennese-born Lilia Skala, who became the first female architect in Austria, a stage star in Max Reinhardt's theatre, and finally a Hitler refugee who worked her way out of a New York textile factory to a career on Broadway and television and in film. Her most famous role was the mother superior in Lilies of the Field, for which she was nominated for an Academy award.

Lilia's granddaughter, Canadian-born Libby Skala, has written a play about her grandmother, Lilia!, in which she performs the title role. Poor Alex Theatre. $8. July 7 to 14. 416-862-2222. www.Liliashow.homestead.com.

Another Fringe play of note is Slap, by Evan Brooker, involving a trash-talk show host, some "gender-bender" characters and their "sordid sensuality," and a grandfather named Mordechai who survived the war as a Polish partisan. Tarragon Mainspace. July 6 to 14. 416-966-1062.

• Fosse, the Tony-award-winning musical about the legendary choreographer-director Bob Fosse, returns to Toronto for eight performances, June 19 to 24. $38 to $92. Pantages Theatre. 416-870-8000.

• Tradition! on TVO on June 23 features interviews with director Norman Jewison and actors Rod Steiger, Sidney Poitier and Carl Reiner; then a screening of Jewison's Fiddler On The Roof, starring Chaim Topol as Tevye, and Norma Crane, Leonard Frey, Molly Picon, Paul Mann and Rosalind Harris.

• The Canadian Stage Company is including a production of Adam Baum and the Jew Movie in its upcoming season. The play, by former Torontonian Daniel Goldfarb, won an award last year after its theatrical debut in Manhattan.

• The Colours of Jazz, a celebration of jazz in the paintings of Telford Fenton, Michael Fisher, David Gnass, Myra Lowenthal, Marilyn McKay, Berge Missakian and Paul Peregal, continues to July 15 at the Robert Mede Gallery, 321 Davenport Rd. 416-966-9362.

500 people turn out to sing along with Tevye

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

TORONTO — Without tradition, says Tevye in Fiddler on the Roof, our lives would be shakier than a fiddler on the roof.

And that is why, rather than continue to use its auditorium for theatre productions, the Bloor JCC held a fund-raiser recently to raise money for a new theatre, where plays are traditionally held.

An enthusiastic crowd of just under 500 people filled the Bloor Cinema, many of them dressed in beards and babushkas, to take part in a sing-along showing of the award-winning 1971 movie, Fiddler on the Roof.

"We were very pleased with the turnout," said Frances Enchin, cultural arts manager at the JCC and an organizer of the fund-raiser.

"We had no idea how many would come in costume, but everyone turned up in the spirit [to have a good time]."

The evening began to the music of a fiddler. Then, those in costume paraded across the stage, and prizes, such as bagels and rugelach, were awarded for the best and most creative costumes.

Just before the movie began, instructions were given out by the evening's host, actor, comedian, singer and Bloor JCC fitness instructor, David Gale. For instance, the audience was told to hiss when the Captain appeared and to wave their hands in the air whenever Tevye, the father and main character, did.

Yet the audience needed no instructions. With the words to the movie displayed on the screen, it seemed as if every person, young and old alike, joined the movie's characters in singing such well-loved songs as If I Were a Rich Man, Tradition, and Sunrise, Sunset.

Originally a successful Broadway show, Fiddler on the Roof tells the story of Tevye, a Ukranian milkman who clings to Jewish tradition while his daughters marry men he considers to be increasingly unacceptable. Meanwhile, the anti-Semitism of the ruling Russian government threatens to drive him from his home.

Experience the charm of a kibbutz

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

HAGOSHRIM, Israel — It's a hotel with a view.

A fabled river, the Jordan, runs through its manicured grounds. Mt. Hermon, the highest peak in these parts, rises majestically in the background.

The hotel is situated on a major north-south migratory bird route. Farmers tend to field crops – from cotton and maize to tomatoes and alfalfa – within walking distance of the spacious dining room, which serves a first-rate, all-you-can-eat breakfast.

Hagoshrim, however, is far from unique. Kibbutz hotels are found all over Israel, from the Galilee to the Negev.

The beauty of the kibbutz hotel is two-fold.

It offers clean, well-lit rooms with all the amenities – air conditioning, cable TV, radio and telephone – at reasonable rates.

The kibbutzniks at Hagoshrim encourage you to wander around and ask questions. They want you to learn more about their home.

Nestled snugly in the Hula Valley, in the shadow of the brooding Golan Heights, Hagoshrim is spread on 450 hectares of lush land, just east of Kiryat Shmona and south of Kibbutz Dan.

It's a bucolic area, glinting with fish ponds, lagoons and streams and sparkling with dark green fields on bright, sunny days.

Hagoshrim was founded in 1948, the year of Israel's birth, by young Sephardi immigrants from Turkey.

Like many kibbutzim, it started as an agricultural commune and branched into industry and tourism.

The hotel was established with 24 rooms in 1953, before the age of mass tourism to Israel.

Having expanded to meet growing demand, it has 180 rooms today, all conforming to international standards.

The hotel has an indoor and an outdoor swimming pool, a sauna, two squash courts, a basketball and a badminton court, a table-tennis room and a weight-lifting room with treadmills and exercise bicycles, among other equipment.

Massages, from Swedish to holistic, are available by appointment.

Hagoshrim is a bird watcher's paradise, both in spring and autumn. During the migration season, in a sight to behold and remember, dazzling formations of winged creatures descend upon the Hula Valley, flying from Europe to Africa and back again via the Middle East.

Upon request, kibbutz guides can lead you to their nesting places.

Approximately three hours by car from Tel Aviv, the hotel is close to the region's natural attractions.

Guests can enjoy kayak and rafting rides on the Hatzbani River.

They can visit the Tanur, the impressive waterfall south of Metulla, Israel's northernmost settlement. The cataract is best seen in winter and spring.

Waterloo student talks Israel with JSA members

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

WATERLOO, Ont. — Mark Eltis doesn't think it's logical to ask Jewish students to support Israel – perhaps by attending a rally – if they are not informed about the situation there.

And, in the context of the ongoing intifadah, some students don't have the confidence or knowledge to take on critics.

In an effort to remedy that, Eltis, a University of Waterloo optometry student now entering third year, spoke recently to about 20 members of the Jewish Students' Association (JSA) at the JSA's new Albert and Temmy Latner Jewish Students' Centre of Kitchener-Waterloo.

A second lecture was planned for this week, and he hopes to give another talk in the fall. Because of Waterloo's co-op program, there is a turnover of students every term.

The JSA's executive in charge of Israel Affairs and a former JSA president, Eltis – who writes for the national Jewish student publication Afterword – stays informed by scanning almost a dozen newspapers and Web sites a day.

Mark Eltis

Among his staples, representing a wide range of editorial viewpoints, are the Toronto Star, Globe and Mail, National Post, three Israeli publications – the Jerusalem Post, Ha'aretz and the right-wing Arutz Sheva, as well as the Web sites of CNN, the BBC, Arabia.com and the Lebanon Daily Star.

It takes him at least an hour a day, but he feels even reading headlines is beneficial to get an overview of world perspectives.

"I felt people lacked the tools necessary to combat propaganda," Eltis said in a phone interview last week. "I think it's important for students to be informed and more pro-active."

Applied math student Sasha Gutfraind, who attended Eltis' lecture, considers himself well informed, having attended an Israeli high school. "I think Mark has shown a good example," he said. "I would like to help him."

Iris Barr, an engineering student and JSA executive member, said that although she also keeps herself informed about Israel and has "a lot of Israeli pride...it's good to have an ongoing awareness for the people who do care. I think [the lecture] increased my comfort level, put some facts into perspective."

At the Waterloo campus, students have been confronted with "numerous" anti-Israel displays and articles, over which the JSA and its Muslim counterpart have clashed.

Among other Canadian efforts to address Jewish student apathy – a related issue, which arose at this year's Canadian Jewish Congress plenary – were a blue-and-white ribbon campaign at Queens' University to support Israel and promote hopes for peace; and an activism training session put on in Montreal by UIA Federations Canada, noted Roseanne Brown, director of unfederated campus organizations for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, for the past two years.

At the Montreal event, the Web site www.jewishpride.com was launched, she added.

Eltis' talk was "incredibly positive," said Brown. The turnout was good for the time of year, and people stayed for three hours, she noted.

Because the issues are so vast, Eltis decided to focus on the history of the conflict. The 1948 Arab rejection of the United Nations partition plan, under which Palestine would have been divided into a Jewish and an Arab state with Jerusalem as an international city, is key to understanding the context of the current conflict, he believes.

One of the scariest trickle-down effects, Eltis has found, is that some students become ashamed of Israel to the extent that they don't want to associate with Jewish student organizations. Although attendance has not dropped at JSA programs per se, Eltis has found that some students think Israel is "an indefensible cause."

Even when the JSA merged with its Wilfrid Laurier University counterpart in Eltis' first year, it was "a big struggle" to keep support of Israel as part of the JSA constitution, he noted.

"We don't have to be pro-Likud or pro-Labour," he said, "[but] I think we should support the government, the State and the people of Israel and it should be unconditional, just like we accept students who are Reform or Orthodox."

For the record, Eltis describes himself as politically "centre; centre right, perhaps. I think I'm rather open minded to concessions."

Outstanding Winnipeg athletes named at annual Y dinner

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG —The annual Y dinner was held recently, but this year, the Athlete of the Year award was given to two athletes. The Idy and Max Nusgart Memorial Award was presented to budding hockey star Jacob Micflikier and all-round athlete Jill Swirsky.

The 18-year-old Swirsky, who just finished her first year of university, was the 2000 Manitoba Moose Provincial Female High School Athlete of the Year. She captained the basketball and volleyball teams at Garden City Collegiate and led the basketball team in scoring. She also played soccer and badminton, and was a track-and-field star, winning bronze medals in 3,000-metre, 1,500-metre, 800-metre and cross-country events. She is a graduate of the Hebrew bilingual program in north Winnipeg.

Micflikier, the son of one of Winnipeg's leading physicians, has been an all-star hockey player at all levels. Although only 16, he has played in international tournaments against teams from Russia, the Czech Republic and the United States. He is currently a student at Shattuck Prep School in Minnesota where he scored 41 goals and made 23 assists for the varsity hockey team, and he led the Shattuck-St. Mary's Sabres to the U.S. AAA Midget title. He is trying to catch on next season with the Brandon Wheat Kings of the Western Hockey League.

The other nominees this year for the Nusgart Award were Jamie Adelman, a budding 15-year-old tennis star and member of the Canadian tennis team who will compete in the Canadian Nationals later this year; Josh Hechter, another young hockey player who played for the Quesnel Millionaires of the British Columbia Junior Hockey League last season; track star Elayna Hurtig, who received an Athletics Manitoba Award of Excellence last year; and Fern Yamron, 27, one of the top female bowlers in Winnipeg.

This was the 29th annual dinner. Hal Bordy, executive director of the Rose and Max Rady Jewish Community Centre, the successor to the old YMHA, reports that the dinner drew about 800 people and raised over $65,000. The funds will be put towards Rady Centre children and seniors programming and summer camps and will help pay for new athletic equipment.

Israeli cricketers vie for World Cup

TORONTO — Israel's top cricket players will be in Toronto at the end of the month to compete for the 2001 International Cricket Trophy.

Fifteen countries, including Canada, the United States, Scotland, Hong Kong, Bermuda and Namibia, will participate in the tournament. The top three teams qualify for next summer's World Cup of Cricket in South Africa.

Organizers are billing the Toronto event as the most important cricket tournament ever held in North America and the largest ever held anywhere in the world.

Israel will play a five-game round robin to determine whether it advances to the playoffs.

The brotherhood at Temple Har Zion will serve as a liaison for the Israeli team and will cheer on the Israelis, said Temple president Claude Heimann. The congregation and members of the Jewish community are being urged to attend the games and support the Israeli cricketers.

Israel's schedule is as follows:

June 28 versus Argentina at Eglinton Flats.

June 30 versus France at Eglinton Flats.

July 1 versus Malaysia at Sunnybrook Park.

July 4 versus East and Central Africa at the Ajax Cricket Club in Ajax, Ont.

July 6 versus Uganda at the Ajax Cricket Club.

All games begin at 10:45 a.m.

Memorial tournament showcases Jewish unity

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When he was alive, Joseph Edery could never accept that the Jewish people were fractured along lines of religious observance and that people seemed to focus on the differences between them and not on what brought them together.

Disunity troubled him, so when his sister Joyce organized a memorial tournament in his name, unity was the natural theme for the event.

About 100 young basketball players answered the call recently and got together at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre to play some three-on-three while paying their respects to Joseph.

Joseph died in a car accident about a year ago at age17.

"We wanted to do something in his memory," Joyce, 16, explained. "One of his goals was to create unity. He thought that people misjudged other people and he didn't like the differences between groups of Jews."

To honour his values, Jews from Orthodox, Conservative and Reform streams of Judaism were invited to the tournament, and there were even a few non-Jews from Joseph's old school, Vaughan Collegiate, who participated, she said.

Ironically, Joseph was not particularly into sports, but basketball offered the best chance of attracting young people, Joyce said.

Each participant was asked to ante up $10. Together with corporate and personal donations, the tournament raised about $2,000. The funds will go to partially subsidize three students for a year of study in Israel.

The event itself was organized by Joyce and a group of Joseph's teenage friends, including Uri Nadhim, Joobin Shemtov and Avi Ben-Zvi. David Abrahamovitz provided adult supervision.

מאת: יעל זליגר

About Food

Dear Norene

If you're looking for flavourful ways to include easy, healthy recipes in your meal planning, check out Nettie's Vegetarian Kitchen (Second Story Press) by Nettie Cronish of Toronto. It provides down-to-earth information on vegetarian cooking and is an excellent resource. You'll find delicious recipes, from hearty main courses to delectable desserts, including Picnic Nori Rolls, Vegetarian Moussaka and Sesame Banana Cookies.

Nettie teaches vegetarian cooking classes, and is a former health spa chef and a founding member of Women's Culinary Network in Toronto. She says, "Salads don't have to be rabbit food; with a little imagination and decent leftovers, they can be transformed."

Here are two simple salads from her book that are perfect for summer – or any time!

BROCCOLI WITH ROASTED PEPPERS, OLIVES & FETA CHEESE

1 large bunch broccoli
2 tbsp. olive oil
⅓ cup olives, pitted and sliced
1 roasted red pepper, diced
1 tsp. dried marjoram
2 tbsp. chopped fresh dill
⅓ cup feta cheese, crumbled
2 tbsp. toasted pumpkin seeds
pinch of pepper

Cut broccoli into fairly large florets. Steam for 3 to 5 minutes, until tender-crisp. Rinse under cold water to stop cooking.

Heat oil with sliced garlic in a large skillet. Remove garlic when browned and add steamed broccoli, olives, peppers, marjoram and dill. Cook until just heated through.

Sprinkle feta, lemon juice and pumpkin seeds over broccoli and toss to coat. Add pepper to taste. Serve warm or at room temperature. Makes 4 servings.

TABBOULEH KASHA

1 cup kasha
½ tsp. salt
4 green onions, chopped
¼ cup chopped parsley
2 tbsp. chopped fresh coriander
1 small carrot, grated
1 cup corn
2 cloves garlic, minced
⅓ cup lemon juice
1 tbsp. soy sauce
¼ cup extra virgin olive oil
1 large tomato, sliced in small wedges
¼ cup green olives, sliced

Toast kasha in dry skillet over medium heat, stirring constantly, until kasha turns amber and smells fragrant, about 5 minutes. Bring 2 cups water to a boil, add toasted kasha and salt. Cover and simmer 10 minutes, until water is absorbed. Cool.

Combine green onions, parsley, coriander, carrot and corn. Toss; add to kasha. Whisk together garlic, lemon juice, soy sauce and oil. Pour over kasha mixture; stir together. Garnish with tomato slices. Sprinkle with olives. Chill 30 minutes. Serve on lettuce-lined plates. Makes 6 servings.

Asper slams Canada's ME policy

By FRANCES KRAFT and RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporters

TORONTO — Media mogul Israel Asper strongly condemned the Canadian government for its policy on Israel in a blunt speech at a tribute dinner in his honour last week.

The Winnipeg-based executive chair of CanWest Global Communications Corp. told the audience of about 900 people that it was "a dismaying sight" to watch foreign affairs minister John Manley – "either a prisoner of naiveté or political opportunism, embracing this war criminal, [Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser] Arafat – on Mr. Manley's recent visit to the Middle East."

Speaking at a June 18 Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem dinner at the National Trade Centre, Exhibition Place, Asper referred to Canada's "shameful and wrong-headed policy on Israel, as represented by its pro-Palestinian votes at the United Nations."

One of his objectives in speaking out, said Asper in a phone interview with The CJN last week, was to "urge the government of Canada publicly to reveal and abandon its attempt at even-handedness, when there are clearly good guys and bad guys. You can be even-handed in a dispute where you don't know all the facts. But where the facts are patently obvious, it behooves a government of integrity to take a position."

Asper minced few words in his speech to the Hebrew U friends. Arafat and his "brutal" colleagues, he said, "are the voice, the arm and the fist of their terrorist-sponsoring state partners, Iran, Iraq, Libya, Lebanon and Syria."

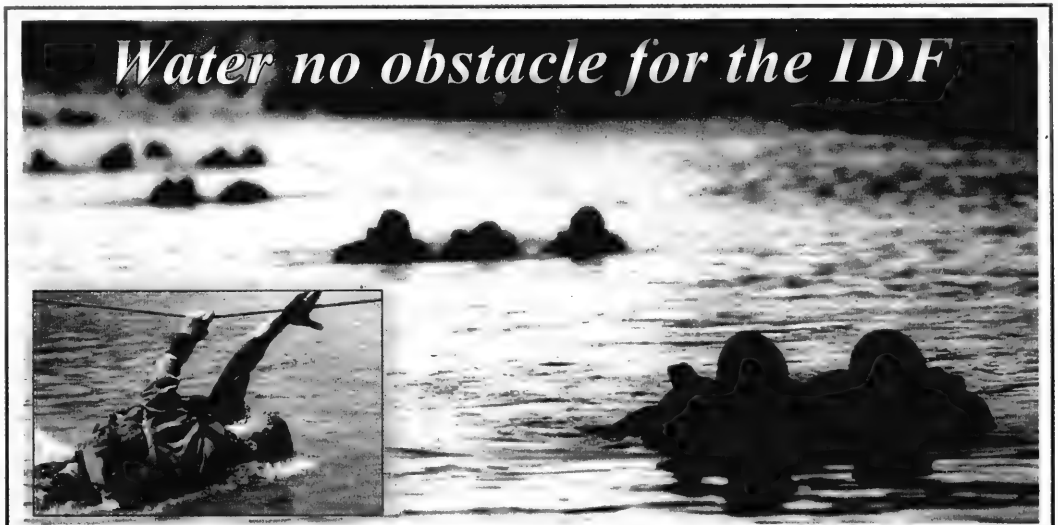
Water no obstacle for the IDF



The "Yael" special unit of the Israel Defence Forces practises passing a water obstacle. (The inset photo has been altered to protect the identity of the soldier.) Volunteer special forces such as Yael have played a very important role in Israel's history. In this issue of The CJN, we commemorate and recall one of the most successful operations ever undertaken by Israel's special military forces; the Entebbe rescue. [Israel Sun photo]

The News in Brief

Canada

Lastman Apologizes

TORONTO — Mayor Mel Lastman apologized last week for an allegedly racist statement about his recent visit to Kenya, where Toronto 2008 Olympic Games officials lobbied African International Olympic Committee delegates. Earlier this month, the mayor jokingly expressed fear of being "in a pot of boiling water with all these natives dancing around me." In a statement last week, Lastman said the comment "was made off the cuff and was never intended to offend anyone. I should not have made this comment. I wish to extend my apologies to anyone who was offended by my comments. I am sincerely sorry for any offense I have caused."

Hate Material

BROOKS, Alberta — Local citizens were shocked recently when a U.S.-based hate group, the National Alliance, distributed pamphlets in the town, southeast of Calgary. Over 30 flyers and posters proclaiming, "Too White to be Hate Crime Victims" were reported to the RCMP, according to B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights.

Training for Military

TORONTO — Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee, has been chosen by the Canadian military for its extensive experience in global humanitarian and medical relief to train an elite squad of military medical personnel for emergency deployment of small field hospitals and the treatment and study of various diseases. On June 18, health care professionals associated with Ve'ahavta conducted a series of seminars at Canadian Forces Base Petawawa.

Book Launch

TORONTO — Immigration minister Elinor Caplan last week helped launch From Immigration to Integration, the Canadian Jewish Experience: A Millennium Edition, a book released by B'nai Brith Canada's Institute for International Affairs, part of Canada's millennium initiative.

Tapes Raise Ire

OTTAWA — The narrator of an evangelical Christian videotape mailed anonymously to more than 150 Jewish homes in Ottawa this month says he's "appalled" by the mailing and is trying to find out who's behind its distribution. The videotapes, containing a 10-part series called Israel in Prophecy produced by the Texas Media Centre, were mailed in brown envelopes with U.S. postage. There was no return address on the packages, sent to Jewish households and some non-Jewish homes.

Yesha's Call

JERUSALEM — A group representing Jewish settlers in the West Bank and Gaza Strip urged right-wing parties that belong to coalition to bolt the unity government. The Yesha Council cited Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's policy of restraint in dealing with Palestinian violence.

Sperm Bank?

JERUSALEM — An Israeli group has proposed setting up a sperm bank for Israeli soldiers to protect their ability to have children in the event of injuries suffered during military service. The New Family organization said the sperm bank also would enable army widows and wives of MIAs to have children from their spouses.

New Book

MOSCOW — A book on Russian-Jewish relations by Alexander Solzhenitsyn debuted in Moscow bookstores this month. In an interview, the Nobel Prize-winning author said he expects the book to spark controversy.

Gay Fund

CHICAGO — This city's Jewish federation is establishing what is believed to be the first federation fund in North America designated for gay and lesbian needs.

Dynamite Sales

MADRID — A militant Basque separatist group sold dynamite to Hamas last year, according to a Spanish newspaper. But some of the explosives Hamas purchased from the Basque group ETA could not be used because of its poor quality, according to El Mundo.

Scientists Apologize

BERLIN — A German scientific society has apologized to the victims of medical experiments carried out during the Nazi era. As part of its efforts to come to terms with the past, the Max Planck Society invited former victims to attend a reconciliation ceremony later this month in Germany.

Remembering the 'King of Kensington'

TORONTO — An MPP and a downtown businessman are spearheading a campaign to erect a statue and a memorial garden in the heart of Kensington Market in memory of award-winning actor Al Waxman.

The garden and full-size bronze statue will be placed in Bellevue Square in front of the Kiever shul, hopefully some time in the spring of 2002, said MPP Mike Colle.

Colle, along with Tom Mihalik, proprietor of Tom's Place on Baldwin Avenue, kicked off the project on May 30 and so far they have collected more than $20,000 towards the estimated cost of $80,000.

Waxman died unexpectedly in January at age 65 from complications resulting from heart surgery. His funeral witnessed an outpouring of grief as he was remembered as a proud Canadian, a great actor and a real mentsch who gave immigrants pride in their heritage.

Waxman had the lead role on the 1970s TV show King of Kensington.

Response to the fund-raising effort has been widespread, with hundreds of people donating amounts as low as $5 and $10, Colle said.

"We knew and respected Al Waxman, so we said, why not do something in the market, which was so close to him and a part of his life, to commemorate this great Canadian.

"We wanted to celebrate his great life and what he meant to us. Al Waxman made us feel comfortable as new Canadians in our own country and proud of our heritage."

Tuition subsidy form reviewed after complaints

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Many parents opening up Jewish day school applications this year found new tuition subsidy forms included in their packages.

"This form differs from every form that I have ever seen before in the detail that it requires," says York University Prof. Martin Lockshin.

The six-page questionnaire was recently adopted by Associated Hebrew Day Schools, the Bnei Akiva schools, Leo Baeck Day School and Netivot HaTorah. The Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) has been using the form for the past four years.

This specific UJA FEDERATION Board of Jewish Education's (BJE) questionnaire asks for unprecedented detail such as amounts spent on groceries, toiletries, household supplies and grooming, Lockshin said.

It is very difficult for many families to seek community support for their children's education in the first place. Lockshin believes that this application adds further humiliation for no valid reason.

After receiving complaints about the form, BJE's executive director Seymour Epstein decided to take it back to committee for reconsideration.

"I agreed with the complaints that the questions were demeaning," Epstein said, adding that it was decided after committee consultations that the "UJA would take all steps to remove the communal name from the form and recommend to the schools that the form never be used in the first instance."

The BJE is suggesting that the schools go back to the more limited form which was used by many of the schools until this year, and that the more intrusive form be required only in special cases where more information is needed.

However, because the BJE is not a public board and doesn't control the schools, it would be up to each individual school to decide which of the two forms to use, Epstein said.

The decision by the schools to implement the forms this year may have been based on a desire for standardization. Since CHAT had already been using the forms for several years, it was felt by the other schools that they should follow suit.

Brian Lass, current CHAT president and former chair of the tuition committee, feels that for many families it is the process of applying for financial assistance itself that is difficult. Once that decision is made, Lass said, intrusive questions won't keep parents from applying to Jewish day schools. However, CHAT will look at the issue again and may decide to remove some of the questions, he said.

All parties agree that finding the right balance between fiscal responsibility and treating people with compassion and mentschlichkeit is always hard.

Bernard Shoub, BJE director of school finances, said that while the primary responsibility for the education of a child lies with the parents, the community attempts to assist those families who cannot afford full fees.

The forms are distributed in an effort to direct community resources to those who honestly need the finances.

"If [the system] becomes fiscally irresponsible, the community and the school is put in financial danger," Epstein said. "If you become overly demeaning and insulting to parents, you violate a very important value."

Most people – those who work on subsidy committees and those who apply for assistance – are good-hearted and honest, Shoub said.

And in most situations the general handling of this particular piece of community work is done quite well. On the other hand, when inappropriate forms are used or when committee members become rude in their investigations, the balance has clearly been violated, Epstein said.

Indeed, Lockshin said it is a very important tenet of Jewish tradition not to humiliate those who need help. And for many people, the level of detail required on these forms is demeaning.

In today's environment, part of the problem may be that many of us find it difficult to justify subsidizing those who earn an income of $80,000 to $120,000. However, a family with an income of $100,000 with three kids in Jewish day schools needs help, Lockshin said.

"Throughout rabbinic literature, one of the big questions for the community has been regarding the giving of charity and the standard of living that a recipient of communal aid should receive."

In deciding between fiscal responsibility and personal compassion, Lockshin feels that it would be more Judaic to err on the side of compassion.

Aspects of Entebbe

From the editor's desk

These are difficult times for Israel and its supporters around the world. Israelis yearn to make peace with the Palestinians, but the Palestinian leadership resists. Israel strives to resist war, but the Palestinian leadership seems intent on no other course.

Without any apparent immediate or medium-term solution for this worrisome, potentially very bloody dilemma, Israel and Israelis conduct their daily lives under a sense of crisis.

The future is cloudy. Sometimes, however, we can find, in the past, a light to help us shine a path through those clouds.

Twenty five years ago this week, on the 6th day of Tammuz (July 4th), the Israel Defence Forces travelled more than 4,000 kilometers to Entebbe, Uganda to rescue more than 100 Jewish men, women and children being held hostage there.

It is important we remember that historical moment.

In this issue of The CJN, therefore, in addition to this page, readers will find items about the Entebbe rescue in the editorial, Perspectives and Jewish Life pages.

This column recounts a number of different aspects of the rescue.

* * *

Consistent with the moral inversion that beset the United Nations after the Six-Day War of 1967, Israel was brought before the "bar of justice" in the Security Council on complaints by members of the Organization of African States, including Egypt and Uganda, for having committed an act of aggression against Uganda in the rescue of the Jewish hostages.

Israel's ambassador to the UN, Chaim Herzog, delivered an impassioned and powerful defence of the Jewish State. In the process, he exposed the vulgar and vicious ruler of Uganda, Idi Amin, to have been thoroughly complicit in the hijacking even from the planning stages. (The full text of Ambassador Herzog's address appears in Who Stands Accused? Israel Answers its Critics, Chaim Herzog, Random House, 1978.)

In the course of his fiery remarks, Ambassador Herzog said: "It has fallen to the lot of my small country, embattled as we are, facing the problems which we do, to demonstrate to the world that there is an alternative to surrender to terrorism and to blackmail.

Last photo of Yoni

"…We come with a simple message to the Council. We are proud of what we have done because we have demonstrated to the world that in a small country in Israel's circumstances… the dignity of man, human life and human freedom constitute the highest values. We are proud not only because we have saved the lives of over one hundred innocent people… but because of the significance of our act for the cause of human freedom."

* * *

Ambassador Herzog also made the following telling point. "…some delegations have tended to ignore the group which organized this hijacking – namely, the PLO. The PLO has issued a statement disassociating itself from this operation. This is a lie. The PFLP, to which the hijackers belonged, is a constituent member of the PLO. Members [of the Security Council] will recall in the past, the PLO denied any knowledge of the Black September organization, although Yasser Arafat's second-in-command actually commanded it."

* * *

Three of the hostages lost their lives in the operation. Another hostage, 73-year-old Dora Bloch, was dragged from her Kampala hospital where she had been taken during the hostage ordeal after choking on some food. She was savagely beaten and murdered by Idi Amin's men.

* * *

Sergeant Sorin Herscu, an immigrant from Romania and nearing the time of his release from the IDF when he volunteered for the Entebbe operation, was wounded in the spine. As a result, he became quadriplegic. In 1990, he was working as a computer operator.

Lieutenant Colonel Yonatan (Yoni) Netanyahu, the commander of the rescue operation, was the only IDF soldier killed.

* * *

Shlomo Gazit, then chief of military intelligence, summarized the rescue with these words. "The operation was a brilliant military victory, reflecting imagination, daring, courage and professional skill of the highest quality anywhere in the world. The success of the main objective of the mission – storming the terminal building, wiping out the captors and guards and speedily liberating the hostages so that nearly all of them remain unharmed – must be credited in decisive measure to the commander of the force who planned, prepared and rehearsed the breakthrough, that is to the credit of Yoni."

Yad Vashem slammed for choice of Clinton

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem is being accused of showing insensitivity to the Rwandan genocide by inviting former U.S. President Bill Clinton to address a major fund-raising event in Toronto this week.

Representatives of the Rwandan community say Clinton should be the last person to address an organization that memorializes Holocaust victims, because he did so little to prevent the Rwandan genocide in which as many as one million people were killed in a three-month span.

Rwandan expatriates and their supporters promised to picket Clinton's appearance at the fund-raiser, which was scheduled for Monday evening at the Hummingbird Centre in downtown Toronto.

A spokesperson for the Yad Vashem society, while acknowledging the tragic events in Rwanda, rejected critiques of their choice of Clinton. "Our event was never intended to become a platform for politics. As a charitable organization, we find this disheartening," said Marilyn Somers, executive director of the Canadian Yad Vashem society.

Canadian Jewish Congress president Keith Landy said Clinton has already apologized for America's lack of action and that others too – including UN Secretary General Kofi Annan, the Belgian government and even Canada – could have done more. But it is improper to denigrate Yad Vashem over its choice of Clinton, he said.

Rwandans in Toronto, who lost family in the 1994 genocide, described the issue raised by the Yad Vashem invitation to Clinton as a moral one.

In past speeches on the Holocaust, Clinton intoned the phrase, "never again," which speaks about preventing mass murders. Yet "when he was in power he did not do anything about [the Rwandan genocide]," said Gilbert Gatali.

"Clinton is not the right person to talk about [the Holocaust] because of his moral record," said Juliet Karugahe. "He was completely cowardly in the face of genocide."

Karugahe, who recently participated in the March of Remembrance and Hope, a mission that brought international students to witness Nazi death camps in Poland, said she supports Yad Vashem's goal of raising funds for a Wall of Remembrance. She urges the Rwandan community to help the organization attain that goal. She said she understands Yad Vashem chose Clinton as a high profile speaker who could help it reach its financial goals.

"But I don't think the end justifies the means. It's an immoral way to get a moral end," she said.

Somers said the decision to invite Clinton – who commands a $100,000 (US) fee – "is based on his familiarity with Yad Vashem and all it stands for, as well as his obvious affinity for Israel. We expect his appearance will raise awareness of our organization and specifically the Holocaust Wall of Remembrance."

Rwandan Leo Kabalisa, who lost 82 relatives in the genocide, including four brothers and his father, said it would be hypocritical for Clinton to speak about the Holocaust. "When he was president and had a Security Council vote, he refused to send UN troops to Rwanda," he said.

Kabalisa's wife, Melanie Simons, who is Jewish, recently completed a thesis on the Rwanda genocide. Simons said the UN Security Council knew about events in Rwanda and were warned by UN personnel on the ground that events were about to unravel. "President Clinton had the power to act and he did not. In my opinion, it was because there was no American stake in Rwanda, no mineral or oil. Strategically, it is not an important area."

Nazi hunter Efraim Zuroff, head of the Jerusalem office of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, said Rwandan critics of Clinton "are 100 percent right in terms of their assessment of his role in the Rwandan genocide. He bears a certain amount of indirect responsibility for the failure of the world to stop that genocide.

"I understand their frustration and rage but I don't think he should be disqualified."

Clinton subsequently travelled to Rwanda and apologized for the U.S. inaction, Zuroff said. (Rwandans interviewed by The CJN called the apology "arrogant" and unsatisfactory.) The creation of the International Tribunal on Rwanda, which prosecutes war criminals, would never have been established without U.S. support.

"And I have no doubt that the decision to send troops to Kosovo was a result of the lessons learned in Rwanda and Bosnia," he said.

Insured Annuities - Lifetime Guarantees of 9% Plus

In today's environment of low interest rates and volatile stock markets, many investors seek more attractive and less stressful investments.

If you are at retirement age and trying to maximize spendable income from non-RRSP savings, insured annuities provide the best of both worlds - significantly higher after-tax income for life and the capital guaranteed tax-free to your estate. The older you are, the higher the yield on your investment.

Consider the following example, which compares the investment of $200,000 in a GIC at 5% with an insured annuity, for a man aged 75.

GIC versus Insured Annuity

	GIC	Insured Annuity
Capital	200,000	200,000
Annual Income	10,000	23,500
Taxable Income	10,000	4,500
Tax (50%)	5,000	2,250
After Tax Income	5,000	21,250
Insurance Cost	NIL	11,250
Spendable Income	5,000	10,000
Gross Equivalent Yield	5%	10%
Estate Value	200,000	200,000
Subject to Probate	YES	NO
Guaranteed Period	5 YEARS	LIFE

Effective improved yield on investment = 100%

Sudden board decision leaves Lodzer without a rabbi

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Lodzer Centre Holocaust Congregation has been without a spiritual leader as of June 1.

Members of the 250-family synagogue – which is unaffiliated but holds traditional Conservative-style services – were notified last November that Rabbi Ronnie Cahana's employment contract would be completed on Aug. 31 and that he would continue to fulfil his obligations to the congregation until that time.

But on the morning of May 31, the mother of a boy who celebrated his bar mitzvah on June 2 was notified by phone that Rabbi Cahana was no longer with the synagogue. Instead, Rabbi Louis Schechter, Rabbi Cahana's predecessor, who retired in 1998, was brought in from Texas for two weeks.

"You can imagine my shock," said the mother, who did not wish to be identified. The previous night, her family had been with Rabbi Cahana at the synagogue for the bar mitzvah rehearsal. When they left for home at 9 p.m., there was no indication that anything was amiss, she said, adding that the decision was apparently made that night.

Board members are tight-lipped about the reason behind their decision to discontinue the rabbi's service to the synagogue. Attempts to interview president Sidney Silver were not successful.

In its letter to members dated Nov. 1, 2000, the board of directors wrote that the decision not to renew the rabbi's contract was "based on several considerations, the most substantial being financial."

The letter thanked Rabbi Cahana and his wife Karen for their warmth and dedication and wished the family well in future endeavours.

Rabbi Cahana, who headed a Conservative congregation in Gothenberg, Sweden, before moving here, is still teaching bar mitzvah students and has officiated at a wedding that was not held in the synagogue, he confirmed recently.

"I considered it to be holy work to be part of a Holocaust community," he said. In fact, he still attends daily services at the Lodzer. "Whatever this issue is, it's not something I understand."

Board distances self from 'racist' material

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — Facing increasing pressure, the chair of the York Region District School Board has publicly distanced the board from the actions of a member of its race relations advisory committee who distributed anti-Semitic material.

At a board meeting last week, Bill Crothers read a statement in which he said the actions of Bader Abu-Zahra were "antithetical to the principles on which the board has been built."

The board "dissociates itself from the distribution of anti-Semitic materials in any form, to any group operating under the board's auspices, at any time, under any circumstances," Crothers stated.

Abu-Zahra's actions "were taken without the knowledge of the board. Had the materials in question been submitted to the board prior to their distribution, they would never have been approved. We strongly criticize this action."

The controversy was sparked in April, at a board-sponsored conference on teaching racism. At a workshop on teaching the Holocaust, Abu-Zahra handed out copies of a review of Norman Finkelstein's book The Holocaust Industry – Reflections on the Exploitation of Jewish Suffering, which argues that Jews use the Holocaust for political and financial gain.

Alan Shefman, a school trustee and chair of the race relations committee, called the material "a sophisticated form of anti-Semitism," and he asked for Abu-Zahra's immediate resignation.

Abu-Zahra refused to quit, saying Shefman's demands "only confirm Finkelstein's point."

In May, race relations committee members voted 12-9 that Abu-Zahra should not be removed from the volunteer post.

Canadian Jewish Congress then got involved, saying further action against Abu-Zahra was needed. Crothers said he would welcome any resolution, short of removing Abu-Zahra from the committee.

Ed Morgan, chair of CJC's Ontario region, welcomed Crothers' statement last week. Morgan said he feels Abu-Zahra should be removed from his post, "but we're willing to discuss it further."

CJC, board members and Shefman are scheduled to meet this week to further take up the matter.

Beit Rayim and Adath Sholom to tie the knot

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It may seem like a mixed marriage, but members of the egalitarian Conservative Beit Rayim Synagogue in Richmond Hill and the traditional Conservative-style Adath Sholom Synagogue in Toronto have voted overwhelmingly in favour of a merger.

The two congregations plan to build a synagogue in a new Thornhill development just east of Bathurst Street, south of Highway 407.

Pending government approval of the merger and the building plans, the new synagogue, which has yet to be named, is expected to be built on a 2.5-acre lot in time for Rosh Hashanah 2003. Until that time the synagogues will operate in their current facilities – Adath Sholom on Sheppard Ave. W., and Beit Rayim in rented premises on Bayview Ave.

The land purchase is set to close on Nov. 1.

The synagogue will be affiliated with the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, as is Beit Rayim, and will hold egalitarian services. It would be the first such synagogue in Vaughan.

Adath Sholom members have "fully embraced our approach," said Harris Korn, chair of the communications team for the combined entity. The decision to merge was endorsed by well over 80 percent of voters, he said.

Beit Rayim practices "voluntary egalitarianism," according to Doron Kaminski, a co-chair of the merger committee. Women are counted as part of a minyan, receive aliyot, wear tallitot and read from the Torah, but the customs are "embraced only by those members who feel they wish to participate," he clarified.

The merger is a "wonderful" match, said Korn. "A lot of the members in Adath Sholom are seniors, and they want a home for their children. We look to them as a group that can bring a lot of history. We're a young and growing congregation looking to have a permanent home. They look to Beit Rayim because we're a young congregation and they see the opportunity to join with us to secure a future for their congregation."

Beit Rayim was established in 1992, and Adath Sholom dates back to 1926 when it was established as a social club called the Young Men's Minsker Farband.

Adath Sholom's late president, Mike Rogow, who died recently, had a vision of the congregation being revitalized by joining with a young congregation in York Region, according to a news release from the two synagogues. "We regret that his recent passing made it impossible for him to see the realization of this dream," said Mark Lockwood, the synagogue's executive director, in the news release.

"Our shared goal is to build a new, vibrant home for our congregations, a place where we, our children and future generations can share in the haymishe tradition and philosophy that we are all so proud of," said Kaminski in the release.

Although the size of the building has yet to be determined, it would have enough space to accommodate all existing congregants (about 300 families from Beit Rayim and about 250 families from Adath Sholom) and have room for growth, said Korn.

When resolve, courage, dignity and freedom met

All who love freedom and believe in the inherent dignity of man, will remember with reverence and awe that unbelievable moment 25 years ago when the news bulletin flashed across television screens. The Israel Defence Forces had rescued the more than 100 hostages from their captivity at the Entebbe airport in Uganda.

The date was the sixth day of Tammuz in the Hebrew calendar, July 4, 1976. Americans were celebrating their bicentennial and in one of those profoundly inspiring ironies that history records very infrequently, Israel had given the Americans, indeed, the entire freedom-loving world, the most precious of all celebratory gifts: a breathtaking, heart-rending affirmation that freedom must eventually triumph over enslavement, just as good must eventually triumph over evil.

It was a rare occasion of the highest human significance when resolve, courage dignity and freedom met. For the Jewish people of course, the occasion held extra meaning and extra significance.

On Sunday, June 27, 1976, Air France Flight 139, carrying 256 passengers and a crew of 12, en route from Tel Aviv to Paris, was hijacked shortly after a stopover in Athens, where armed PLO thugs were able to board the plane.

After a forced landing in Libya, the plane settled down in the Entebbe airport in Uganda.

Two days later, on June 29, the hijackers made known their demands: the release of 52 convicted terrorists, 40 from Israeli jails, five from West Germany, six from Kenya and one from Switzerland.

Two days after that, under the supervision of Ugandan soldiers, the hijackers completed the separation of the Jewish from the non-Jewish passengers. The non-Jewish passengers, except for the crew, who chose to remain with the Jews, were sent safely back to Paris.

That singularly sinister and evil act caused an explosion of light and purpose in the metaphysics of Jewish history that every single Jew on earth understood at that horrible moment. The choice was clear: "We shall not die, but live."

The four indispensible strands of the modern Jewish condition – peoplehood, sovereignty, empowerment and justice – intertwined in a fourfold cord, binding the shield to the sword on the outstretched arm of the IDF. That arm, through the darkened skies of night, dared to reach some 4,000 kilometres to bring freedom to 103 Jews held captive for no reason other than that they were Jews.

Some years later, Chaim Herzog summed up the extra meaning and significance for Jews of that rare occasion. "The lesson of Entebbe is that, as opposed to the situation in the past, wherever Jews are in danger, they know that someone is worrying about them. They may sometimes find themselves living in fear, but never again do they have to live without hope."

Hope, indeed, because of Israel and especially on behalf of Israel, must now occupy the centre of modern Jewish life.

Israel not just a vacation resort

"Am I my brother's keeper?" This is the question which Jews from around the world must ask themselves as they withdraw from scheduled trips to Israel. Distancing themselves from the Jewish State may be equated to the abandoning of an injured soldier.

The Israeli people are currently facing their most difficult situation since 1948. It is now that they are most in need of support and encouragement.

The intifadah has unmasked a disheartening picture of what Israel means to certain Jews in the Diaspora who act as if it's some sort of Caribbean resort which is unfit for vacation when service is not up to par. For them, Israel is only a luxury. But Israel is a necessity for the safe continuation of the Jewish people. It has the responsibility of keeping Jews and Judaism united and respected as well as safe.

Now is the time for Jews all over the world to assume their responsibility towards the Jewish State, and to support the country not only as it flourishes, but as it stumbles, too.

Cancellations are justified

Montreal high schools are doing the right thing by cancelling their trips to Israel.

The non-cancellation of trips has caused unnecessary tension between parents and children. Kids at this age think they are invincible, that no harm will come to them. Parents' concern for their children's safety is seen by the children as just an overreaction.

Israel has gone through many crises and violent uprisings, but the events of the past nine months have been extremely disturbing and brutal. The bombings and the attacks are no longer confined to the outskirts of the desert; they are happening all over the country, in places most frequently visited by tourists and students.

As a parent, I can only imagine the mental anguish and emotional roller-coaster I would experience if I had a child travelling there at this time.

Such a trip should be uplifting and joyous, filled with a sense of pride and celebration at who we are and where we come from. Having to look over your shoulder at every crossroad and every public place is definitely not a way to see and experience the Jewish State.

As Jews, it is our moral obligation and duty to visit Israel, but not at the expense of our children's lives.

Reporters, investigate Hobeika

Why do reporters continue to lay blame on Ariel Sharon for the Sabra and Shatilla massacres?

Why don't they lay the direct responsibility on the perpetrators themselves: the Christian militiamen and the commander of Christian forces who carried out the Sabra and Shatilla massacres, a Lebanese named Elie Hobeika?

Why don't reporters investigate Hobeika, who was a Syrian double agent at the time?

Yes, an Israeli state commission found that Sharon bore indirect responsibility because he was the Israeli military commander at the time. But neither Hobeika nor any other Lebanese perpetrators were ever brought to trial by Lebanon or any other criminal court.

Israel alone, the only democratic state in the region, felt the moral obligation to investigate whether an Israeli had any link to the crime. It did not have the jurisdiction to investigate the Lebanese for their involvement.

Reporters should investigate why Lebanon and Syria do not feel a similar moral obligation to reveal the truth and bring the perpetrators to justice.

Adding to Wallenberg story

As the president of the Raoul Wallenberg International Movement for Humanity, I wish to point out some shortcomings in the article about the declaration of Wallenberg Day (CJN, June 14).

Wallenberg did not die in 1945. The Soviet government claimed that Wallenberg had died in 1947. The final report of the Russian side of the Swedish-Russian Working Group on the Fate of Raoul Wallenberg, published on Jan. 12, 2001, gave the same date. The report also states that Wallenberg was shot in the prison. The Swedish side of the group did not agree with either conclusion. It considers the question still open and insists on further research.

There were two ghettos in Budapest with different names. Wallenberg saved the Central Ghetto with more than 69,000 people in it. The total number of Jews he saved, 100,000, consists of people who received so called Schutzpasses (faked Swedish passports), their under-aged children and the inhabitants of the Central Ghetto. There are attempts to diminish Wallenberg by disputing the number of people he rescued.

As for his alleged arrest by the Soviet army, the whole story is still not known.

Canada, as one of the world's democratic countries, has chosen the day of Wallenberg's arrest to express its objections to the totalitarian regime of the former Soviet Union, which ignored international law, arrested the Swedish diplomat and kept him secretly confined without trial for years.

The struggle for the truth about Wallenberg's arrest and imprisonment continues; it demands accurate information. It is a matter of great importance that children will know about Wallenberg and all that he stood for.

Remembering the Entebbe rescue

Twenty-five years ago, on the 6th day of Tammuz, July 4, 1976, the Israel Defence Forces travelled some 4,000 kilometres to rescue their fellow countrymen and others who had been seized by Arab and German terrorists and held hostage under the bombastic, watchful eye of Idi Amin at his airport in Entebbe, Uganda.

It was a military operation of breathtaking daring, skill, imagination and courage.

On this page, we recount some of the images of that remarkable rescue.

The only soldier to die in the operation was its commanding officer, Yonatan (Yoni) Netanyahu, seen at the lower left.

At Yoni's funeral, the then minister of defence Shimon Peres spoke these words: "Of him and of his men, we might say, in David's words: 'They were swifter than eagles and more valiant than lions... 'Yonatan is slain on the high places... I grieve for you, Yonatan my brother, you were very dear to me. Your love was wonderful."

The grief of the Jewish people over Yoni's death was as great as the celebration over the great rescue he led.

We remember him and the great heroism of the IDF.

Opinions

Mr. Arafat's problem

Having read a multitude of comments on the intifadah over the past half year, one of the most concise I have found was written by Thomas Friedman which, in excerpt, says the following:

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

"U.S. Senator George Mitchell is a good man, and the central argument of his report is right, in the narrowest sense: If you want to stop the latest Israeli-Palestinian slide into the abyss, first there must be a cessation of all violence, and then confidence-building steps, including a settlements freeze and Palestinian security measures, can be addressed.

"The settlements are not the core problem. The core problem right now is Yasser Arafat – the Palestinian leader who cannot say 'yes' and will not say 'uncle'.

"President Bill Clinton and Prime Minister Ehud Barak put on the table before Mr. Arafat a historic compromise proposal that would have given Palestinians control of 94 to 96 percent of the West Bank and Gaza – with all the settlements removed, virtually all of Arab East Jerusalem, a return to Israel of a symbolic number of Palestinian refugees, and either the right of return to the West Bank and Gaza or compensation for all the others.

"Not only would Mr. Arafat not take it, he would not even say: 'Well, this was insufficient, but this is the most far-reaching and serious proposal Palestinians have ever seen. Now, I want to enter into a dialogue with the Israeli people and government to see if I can get them to 100 percent.'

"Instead, Mr. Arafat launched the intifadah. He did so because he apparently has not given up his long-term aim of eliminating Israel and is afraid in the short run that if he took 99 percent, he would be killed for the one percent he left on the table. Mr. Arafat has never been willing to tell his people he got them most of what they wanted, and now is the time to end the suffering of as many Palestinians as possible and move on.

"The real problem is that the Palestinians are leaderless today, and that is what the United States, the UN and the Arab world have to face up to. Deep down, they all know it and they admit it to each other in private. There is no Palestinian leader right now willing or able to say yes to a fair historic compromise, and we simply fool ourselves with commissions that don't acknowledge that. Unless the Arabs can stiffen Mr. Arafat by supporting him in any grand compromise, or by creating a context in which an alternative leadership can emerge, this bonfire will rage on and it will consume many, many others."

All too many Palestinians and Arabs in general have not yet given up the idea of eliminating Israel. As long as that hope exists, the intifadah is likely to continue in some fashion – and that may be for a long time.

Russians in life, Israelis in death

The tragic death of close to twenty young Israelis of Russian origin has put a spotlight on the predicament of Israel's nearly 1 million "Russian" immigrants. If a common adage in the past was that "Israelis like immigration, but they don't like the immigrants," the disco-bombing, as it is now referred to, has forced the country to face this reality squarely and painfully.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Nothing brings Israelis together like tragedy. But for most of the Russian immigrant community, the test of their integration is in the texture of life in "normal" times. They have endeavoured to become Israelis while preserving a clear sense of identity and culture. This has resulted in accusations of a self-imposed ghetto lifestyle – which, for the Russians, amount to a rejection.

Historically, Israel's immigrant experience was completely different. The waves of mass immigration in the fifties came at a time when the Israeli version of a melting pot prevailed, and the immigrants were expected to fit into that mould. Today, Israeli society is more fragmented and individualistic. While this should create more tolerance for the Russians' desire to lead a different lifestyle, it has not resolved the tension between old and new Israelis.

The tensions exist on various levels. First is the cultural divide. Russian Israelis feel strongly about preserving their culture, language and customs. They are more reserved and taciturn, and their young people feel alienated from Israel's street culture.

Second is the ideological divide. Many of these immigrants were not motivated by Zionist ideology. They came to Israel, like many immigrants to the West, to create a better life for themselves and their children. They have little knowledge of Israeli history, heritage and national customs – especially the rituals of mourning.

Third is the religious divide. Over 20 percent of the Russian-Israelis are not Jewish according to Halachah, but are Israeli citizens. Since in Israel, personal status on matters of birth, marriage, divorce and death is governed by religious law, this creates an anomaly. Young Russian Israelis were especially pained by the different burial ceremonies for victims of the bombing who were considered Jewish and those who were not. While in secular societies such as ours, different burial ceremonies are the norm, Israelis are first sorting through these matters through the experience of the Russian aliyah.

Through this tragedy, Israelis are also forced to re-examine perceptions about the Russian community's politics. It is viewed as right-wing on the Palestinian question, and close to the left on matters of religion and state. Today, the community is represented in the Knesset by three parties: Avigdor Liberman's Yisrael Beitenu on the right, Natan Sharansky's Yisrael Bealiya in the centre and Roman Bronfman's Democratic Choice on the left. All three reject the melting pot concept and defend the immigrants' right to define their Israeliness in a new way. Sharansky, who formed the first distinctly Russian party in 1996, speaks eloquently of the need for veteran Israelis – rather than the immigrants – to change their thinking.

Ironically, two separate developments may alter this particular Israeli phenomenon of a "distinct society." The tragedy on Tel Aviv's beach has apparently broken down barriers. Israelis now see the Russian immigrants as part of the native Israeli cycle of burial and grief, while the Russians have been touched by the outpouring of support in the aftermath of the bombing. As the relative of a victim said, "I used to think that one percent of Israelis were good people. Now I think that all of those came to our home this week."

And in the realm of politics, the return to a one vote for one party system from direct election of the prime minister and a two-ballot system may force the small Russian parties into larger blocs on either the right or left. Only the two-ballot opportunity allowed such small parties to gain any strength in the Knesset. Faced with one vote, even Russian Israelis will likely prefer to vote for a larger party with a leader they support for prime minister. As a result, it may be the Russian community's political representatives who have to take the first step towards greater integration into existing political frameworks.

Israel in a moment of need

The Jewish press has been full of stories about the decision of various Jewish organizations, such as day schools and the Reform movement, to cancel student trips to Israel this summer. These organizations, no doubt, cannot assume the moral and legal liability for the safety of students and children. And as parents cancel, some trips lack the critical mass to go ahead.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

These stories also point out that general travel to Israel is down dramatically from normal levels. The fate of the Maccabi Games is unclear. Though the Games will go on and Canada is sending a team, it is unclear how many participants that team will have.

Israeli leaders have complained about this abandonment, but it's hard to blame parents of young teenagers who fear for the safety of their children. As the bombing in the Tel Aviv disco demonstrates, no spot in Israel is truly safe.

But this is not the time for adults to abandon Israel. Now is the time for North American Jews to go the extra mile. I am planning to go to a Jewish studies conference in Jerusalem this August. I suppose a major deterioration in the situation would dissuade me from going, but if things are as they are now, I will go.

Over the past months, the Israeli government has been using full-page ads to try to persuade North American Jews to visit. These ads have relayed mixed messages. On the one hand, they have pointed out the normalcy that prevails and the possibilities of doing fun things like going to concerts or to the theatre. On the other, they have tried to tap into the sense of loyalty of Diaspora Jewry, arguing how important it is to visit and celebrate a bar mitzvah there, "especially now." Everyone understands the meaning behind the "now."

I think these ads would be more effective if they emphasized solidarity more than fun and normalcy. Shops and cafes have never been the main reason for travelling to Israel. Visiting now is making a moral statement.

I recall a visit I made to Israel early in the first intifadah in the late 1980s. My Jerusalem hotel was empty – you could have played ball hockey in the main lobby. North American Jews were staying away in droves. One day, two buses pulled up to the hotel. The first was full of German tourists, the second was full of Japanese. I gave a silent prayer of thanks for the brave former Axis powers.

Many regular visitors to Israel know full well that dangers tend to be magnified outside the country, and that life is going on. But it is also true that now there is a strong sense of demoralization in certain Israeli sectors, which is only exacerbated by isolation from Diaspora Jews.

I confess that as I made up my mind to visit Israel this summer, for the first time, I thought about the element of danger. (I admit it has been many years since I took an inter-city bus.) After all, the conference is being held in Jerusalem, where dangers are likely greater than elsewhere in the country. I am not a foolhardy person. But it is important for me and my children that I stand with Israelis in this moment of need.

Visiting Israel, on whatever pretext, is only one thing Canadian Jews can do. Another of equal importance is to mount a campaign directed at the Canadian government to prevent backsliding in official positions in the months and years ahead. There will be enormous pressure on Canada to adopt an "even-handed" approach to Middle East issues. This will mean further UN votes on resolutions which may be one-sided against Israel or Israeli interests.

Canadian Jews, directly and through their organizations, will have to redouble their efforts to convince the government to remain firmly with Israel. Depending on how events unfold, this may create situations that are particularly difficult for Jewish cabinet ministers as well as MPs. They will need the full support of Canadian Jews, and indeed all supporters of Israel, in the near future.

Holland's self-image as a morally courageous nation that fiercely resisted the German occupation at every turn and tried mightily to protect its Jewish citizens from harm during the Holocaust does not conform with the melancholy facts.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Marcel Moring, one of Holland's foremost novelists, levelled this accusation recently during a tour to publicize his latest novel, In Babylon (HarperCollins).

Moring, 43, attacked Holland's wartime record in spite of the fact that his parents, Lena and Dick, were hidden by Dutch Christians and despite his acknowledgement that Holland was a safe haven for Jews from the 17th century onward.

Far from resisting the Nazis on a sustained basis, the Dutch government basically complied with their demands. "The whole system was geared to co-operating with the Germans," said Moring. "The Dutch were not heroic. They were like the rest of Europeans. There is no reason for [them] to be proud of their role in the war."

Moring, whose novels are bestsellers in the Netherlands, claimed that the Dutch did precious little to help Jews. "The rule was to cooperate with the Germans."

"The Dutch have a very unsatisfactory record with respect to Jews," he added, pointing out that more than 80 percent of Holland's Jews were murdered in the course of the Holocaust, one of Europe's highest genocide rates. "They did not valiantly defend the Jews. The Dutch just didn't care. It was every man for himself. I can come to no other conclusion but that they considered Jews expendable."

It may have been a case of sheer self-preservation, or simply indifference to the fate of the Jews, he speculated.

The situation was not much better even after Holland's liberation by the Allies. "In some cases, Jews, having lost their identity papers, couldn't reclaim their homes. Quite a lot of Jews emigrated after the war."

Strongly believing that Holland has yet to fully come to terms with its past, Moring said, "The Dutch always thought that they were good. They had Anne Frank."

If nothing else, he suggested, Holland has used the memory of the young, precocious Jewish diarist to shield itself from criticism. "Everyone in Holland has exploited the legacy of Anne Frank," he observed. Yet it is often forgotten that she and her family were betrayed by a Dutch person.

To Moring, Anne Frank House, the museum in Amsterdam dedicated to her life and craft, is "an empty symbol" because it glosses over the Nazi era.

Referring to Holland's attitude toward its Jewish citizens during this tragic period, Moring said: "There has not been a fundamental debate as to what went wrong during the Holocaust. The Dutch have always blamed the Germans. They have difficulty accepting that they let the Germans take the Jews away. They are afraid to shatter the self-image of themselves."

Be that as it may, he gives Holland credit for having made reparation payments to Dutch Jews whose property was swallowed up by the Nazis. And he concedes that Holland's reputation as a sanctuary for Jews on the run from persecution is historically accurate. "The Dutch," he said, "consider themselves tolerant."

Moring, whose mother lost 50 relatives in the Holocaust, was born in Enschede, an industrial town near the German border where his father went into hiding. Later, the Morings lived in Assen.

At the age of 13, he wrote his first story, the theme of which was the apocalypse. It was such an accomplished piece that his teacher accused him of plagiarism. "So I wrote another story," said Moring, who ended his formal education after finishing secondary school.

He published his first novel, Mendels Erfenis, to almost unanimous critical acclaim in 1990. "It was a very Jewish novel, dealing with the Jewish generation born after World War II." His second novel, The Great Longing, examined historical memory, and won the Dutch equivalent of the Booker Prize.

A family history, love story and fairytale all rolled into one, In Babylon turns on a Jewish dynasty of clockmakers. The narrators are Nathan Hollander and his niece, Nina. Trapped in a lodge during a blizzard, they explore their family's convoluted history. "In scope, it is my most Jewish novel so far," said Moring, a resident of Rotterdam, his mother's birthplace. The novel, which begins with Isaac Deutscher's epithet, "Trees have roots, Jews have legs," explores the notion that Jews are nomadic.

Marcel Moring

Yet he does not consider himself a "Jewish" novelist. As he put it: "I don't want to narrow myself down to just being Jewish. Most of all, I'm a writer."

Moring, whose works have been translated into some 15 languages, including English and Hebrew, works hard. He constantly rewrites, and on average, he needs five years to produce a novel.

"I have never found it difficult to write or come up with a story. The hardest thing about writing is changing myself. I want every book to be different, and that means pushing myself into directions I previously shunned, and experimenting with style and structure. I like to aim high. I'm a very critical person. I want to grow as a writer from one book to another."

One of Holland's most admired novelists, in addition to fellow Jewish writers Leon de Winter and Harry Mulisch (who is actually half-Jewish), Moring never imagined that he would attain success. "I didn't really care. I just wanted to write, and be read."

For the last two years, Moring has been working on a new novel with a strong Jewish theme. His newest piece of fiction, a very light novella entitled The Dream Room, is a meditation on the nature of happiness.

Ever the iconoclast, Moring is no longer an official member of Holland's 40,000-strong Jewish community. "If you're not religious, why bother? Besides, I don't like to belong to groups. But if it's absolutely necessary, I'll be there."

The past in the present

"The past," mused Rachel Seiffert, "is ever present in Germany."

Drawing on Germany's Nazi interregnum, Seiffert has written a novel that plumbs the soul of 20th century Germany. It unfolds through the eyes of three ordinary Germans during different but converging decades of Germany's turbulent history. The Dark Room (Alfred A. Knopf), described as "ambitious and powerful" by The New York Times, deals broadly with themes such as memory, denial, guilt, moral awareness and responsibility. More pointedly, the novel, three years in the making, grapples with the emotional fallout of the Holocaust.

A 30-year-old former movie editor and director, Seiffert is familiar with these sensitive issues, having been all but weaned on them. Of German ancestry, she was born and raised in Britain, and has been living in Berlin since last summer.

Brought up in a bilingual household, Seiffert was encouraged by her mother, a German peace activist, and by her father, a professor of German at Oxford University, to ask tough questions about Germany's descent into barbarism. In retrospect, she appreciates their "questioning attitude."

She explained that she spun The Dark Room, her first book, from a film script. "I hadn't consciously thought of writing a novel," explained Seiffert, who studied theatre, film and television and then segued into creative writing as a post-graduate student.

In The Dark Room, which she found stressful to write, she examines the lives of Helmut, a photographer's apprentice in Berlin who lacks an understanding of the events swirling around him, including Kristallnacht; of Lore, a teenaged refugee whose pro-Nazi parents have been taken into captivity by the Allies; and of Micha, a teacher obsessed with finding out why his grandfather, an SS soldier, was imprisoned by the Soviets. Although the trilogy of stories in The Dark Room are strictly fictional, art imitates life: Seiffert's paternal grandfather was a member of the Nazi party. Relating to this point, she said, "Anti-Semitism isn't a uniquely German phenomenon, though Nazism is."

Rachel Seiffert

Bullied as a child because of her German background, Seiffert supports efforts to memorialize the Holocaust through plaques, monuments, books, school courses and the preservation of former concentration camps. However, she does not believe that Germany has really come to terms with its Nazi legacy.

"It's been only two generations since the Holocaust, so it isn't surprising," said Seiffert, who was pleased by her novel's positive reception in Germany.

In the future, she has no intention of revisiting the Third Reich in her stories. "I don't want to write about it again," she said emphatically, disclosing that her next novel will be about economic migrants.

'Healers, be healed!'

By RABBI MARK BILLER

Moses cries to God: "They want meat! They regret we left Egypt. They miss the 'free food'... and now they want meat!" Moses continues: "Lord, Why did you saddle me with these people? Nothing is enough for them, and now they want meat. Help me, dear Lord!"

God's response? "Moshe, gather seventy people and they shall help you."

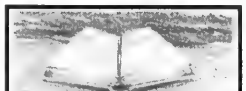
It sounds like a non-sequitur, but the message is clear. Helping Moses doesn't mean helping him find meat. Helping Moses means teaching him that "those who help" need others who help and support.

Moshe needs a network, not a line on kosher rib steak.

It's a message for Moses, and it's a message for us all.

Society encourages independence. The mastery of skills and self-reliance are the first steps to accomplishment and success. As life's tasks become more complex, however, independence can lead to pride and obstinacy.

An inability to turn to others for help, to use others' skills in planning, or to simply take the opportunity to replenish oneself while others offer support, is arrogance – and stands in the way of continued success. Unaided and unreplenished, we become the very rock hit by Moses – hard and ungiving things instead of sources of nourishment and renewal.



Rabbinic Reflections

In this week's Torah portion, Chukkat, we are presented with the enigma of the red heifer – a red calf whose body was burned and whose ashes were used in ritual purification ceremonies. The red heifer is consigned to the category of chok, of rules we do not fully understand yet are commanded by God to follow. Chukkim, however, are not without their lessons.

The mystery within the enigma of the red heifer lies in the ceremony in which the animal's remains are used. The ashes of the heifer spiritually cleanse the ritually impure, while at the same time cause the one who administers this "medicine of ashes" to become ritually impure himself.

Commentators have struggled over why this "spiritual soap" cleanses the patient but robs the handler of his own purity. The answer may be more accessible to the modern reader than to the ancient Israelite.

We live in an age of heightened stress levels and accelerated, complex demands. In our homes, classrooms, doctors' offices and hospitals we see why ours is the age that has coined the term "burn-out." In fact, as any parent, nurse or helper knows, administering the "healing ash" takes a little piece out of the practitioner, until finally the helper needs help herself.

Perhaps the issue of the red heifer is illuminated by God's response to Moshe as the Israelites harangue him for dinner. If I give you meat, God says, I don't really help you. If I teach you how to create support when dealing with all the clamouring people, we have real leadership development.

Chukkat teaches us that those who do the cleansing – the doctors, social workers, psychiatrists, teachers, parents and others among us – get a little used in the process and need cleansing and replenishing.

God orders Moshe and orders us: replenish yourself. It's a mitzvah to find the help and support that enables us to continue our life's work.

New supplementary high school launched

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — This fall, five Conservative synagogues will join to form a new supplementary high school.

Adath Israel, Beth David, Beth Emeth, Beth Shalom and Beth Tikvah will bring students and faculty together with the creation of The Congregational High School – Jewish Studies Program, Cantor Eliezer Kirshblum of Adath Israel said.

"This is an exciting venture, something new and much needed in this city," Kirshblum said.

Cantor Kirshblum

Open to all post bar/bat mitzvah members of the community, Kirshblum noted that "there are no report cards, no assignments and no homework. We appeal to students' interests."

An after-school program has already been running for the past three years in Adath Israel for grades 8 and 9.

"Initially, Baruch Hoffman and Rabbi Steven Salzman joined me and we had a wonderful year of study," Kirshblum said.

Chaim Klein came on board last year when the Beth Tikvah students joined the Grade 8 class and the faculty was able to meet the needs of the 47 students.

"The kids who finished Grade 9 wanted to come back," Kirshblum noted, "but I didn't have the teachers to offer [an after-school] Grade 10 program."

Now, Kirshblum added, "with the other rabbis from the five shuls volunteering their services to teach, the school will be able to add a seminar course for grades 10 to 12 this October."

The Monday night classes will meet from 5 to 7 p.m., and supper will be included.

"The courses offered are relevant and contemporary – meant to challenge the minds of teenagers and address their world.

"And the kids love it – there are heated debates on contemporary issues – biomedical ethics, abortion, euthanasia and genetic manipulation. There are discussions on Jewish philosophy dealing with God and religion, good and evil, revelation and observance.

"We know we're doing a good job when our attendance is at a 90 percent level every week."

Kirshblum considers the program a social as well as an educational experience.

Recognizing that the social aspect of the school is important to students from 13 to 17 years of age, Kirshblum has planned occasional field trips in the city, as well as a four-day March-break trip to Washington D.C., which will include a visit to the Holocaust museum.

"Last year's trip to Washington was very popular with the students," Kirshblum said.

Next year, a Shabbaton and other programs will be added so that students can get together with some of the other congregational high schools in the city, such as Beth Tzedec, the downtown Jewish Community Centre and Shaar Shalom.

As educational director of the school, Kirshblum said that "this has been a dream of mine ever since my arrival [to Adath Israel] in 1967.

"There was one experimental school that we started... about 25 years ago, but it petered out.

"It's a crime that in a city like Toronto, with the community and shuls that we have, there is no viable supplementary high school program.

"In the future, this program may be a sign that shuls will have to come together, and through combined resources, successfully meet the educational needs of teens in the community."

Entebbe raid on the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Twenty-five years ago this week, the world was riveted by a drama that began in the eastern Mediterranean with the hijacking of a jet. It culminated seven days later with a spectacular rescue by the Israel Defence Forces in Uganda. Today, a look at the raid on Entebbe as told on the World Wide Web.

The best Internet summary of the events was written by Maj. (Res.) Louis Williams, a senior press officer for the Israel Defence Forces [http://www.idf.il/english/history/entebbe1.stm]. Williams' Entebbe Diary follows the flight of Air France 139 as it took off from Ben-Gurion Airport on June 27, 1976. Later, four terrorists boarded in Greece and hijacked the plane to Entebbe. In exchange for more than 100 Israeli and Jewish passengers, the release of terrorists was demanded. This is a suspenseful read, full of details possibly forgotten.

One of the names most closely linked to the raid on Entebbe is Jonathan Netanyahu. Born in the United States and educated there and in Israel, Netanyahu was a veteran of the Six Day War. He led the storming party to free the hostages at Entebbe and was the lone Israeli casualty. After the raid, the letters he had written to relatives and friends were collected and published in 1981. Today, Self Portrait of a Hero has just been republished. The Boston Globe wrote: "Yoni's unpretentious accounts of his accomplishments, simply written and thus the more grand, make him the convincing hero he was and make us wish that more like him were among us" [http://www.jpost.com/Editions/2001/05/03/Books/Books.25560.html].

On the day of the hostages' liberation, then-prime minister Yitzhak Rabin addressed the Knesset. "The Israel Defence Forces have achieved one of their most exemplary victories from both the human and moral and the military-operational points of view, a remarkable manifestation of Jewish fraternity and Israeli valour…" You can read Rabin's address online [http://www.usisrael.org/jsource/Terrorism/entebbe1.html].

The raid's impact on Uganda is also interesting. Ugandan political commentator Charles Onyango-Obbo says before the raid Amin had established an army that terrorized his people into submission. The raid "shattered his aura of invincibility. Nothing former Ugandan president Idi Amin did after that could rebuild his grip on the country" [http://www.africanews.com/obbo/article95.html].

Amin was dethroned in 1979 by Tanzanian troops and Ugandan dissidents. The Christian Science Monitor reports that Amin fled to Saudi Arabia reportedly arriving with his two wives and 24 children. He has been there for 22 years, now living in an exclusive community outside Jeddah. In a 1999 interview with a Ugandan newspaper, Amin said he is fond of fishing, watching sports and CNN and playing his accordion [http://www.csmonitor.com/durable/2001/04/19/p23s3.html].

The Internet movie database [http://www.imdb.com] lists four Entebbe-based productions including Victory at Entebbe (1976), Raid on Entebbe (1977), and Operation Thunderbolt: Entebbe (2000). According to reviewer Leonard Maltin, the version you should watch is Mivtza Yonatan (1977) [http://us.imdb.com/Maltin?0076398].

The raid on Entebbe had a profound effect on anyone who cared about the fate of Israel. Jonathan Rosenblum was studying in a 1976 summer ulpan and remembers the tension and then joy that filled the air. "Complete strangers were embracing on the bus. For once, Jewish unity seemed like a reality, not a fundraiser's slogan" [http://www.jewishworldreview.com/jonathan/rosenblum070999.asp]. Decades later, Rosenblum puts those events into perspective. "While the first realization of the miracle of the Entebbe rescue will always rank as one of the happiest memories of my life, the memory today is a bittersweet one. For it always calls in its wake the question: Will we Jews in the land of Israel ever again experience the same feelings of unity we did that morning?"

The passing of a leader

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

In the Torah readings this week, Miriam dies and we begin the end of an era. The text does not describe any national mourning period for Miriam; in fact, the people immediately complain of being thirsty. It is as if this great woman passed away unnoticed. It is a disturbingly real picture of how fleetingly we treat our leaders.

We first meet Miriam as a young girl when she watches over Moses in the Nile. It is she who seizes the opportunity to suggest to Pharaoh's daughter that she call a Hebrew woman to nurse him. Miriam, responsible for uniting Moses with his mother, introduces a major theme in the Exodus narrative: to recognize and act upon the magic of a moment. Moses learns this lesson of leadership as he ushers Israel out of Egypt.

Miriam emerges as a leader of women at the Red Sea. Once Israel is safely across the sea Moses leads the people in a song of praise to God.

Miriam subsequently leads the women with a recitation of the same song expressed through music and dance. Understanding that the women may want to express themselves in their own unique way, she again seizes the moment.

Yet Miriam leads not only the women, but quite literally all of Israel. The nation travels in the desert by watching the cloud that signifies God's presence among them. When the cloud lifts, the camps pack and are ready to move. To signal their readiness, each tribe raises its flag, but the midrash adds that even with the flags raised, nothing happens until Miriam moves to the head of the camp.

Miriam also sustains the people as they travel. Her strong connection to water is reflected in the midrashic statement that a well – called Miriam's Well – travels with Israel through the desert. Upon her death, the well disappears, which explains why the people complain of being thirsty immediately after she dies.

Although identified as a prophet, Miriam, like all Jewish leaders, was not a saint. The text describes an incident of gossiping and sibling rivalry that occurred between her, Aaron and Moses. After she is punished, it is Moses, the object of her gossip, who prays to God for her healing.

The midrash tell us that it is Moses and Aaron who privately bury Miriam and mourn her passing. Yet their personal loss and private sorrow is interrupted by God instructing them to address the people's need for water.

The nation does not make room for their leaders as people. They mourn Miriam only because her death deprives them of the well. The text presents a true picture of the personal challenges involved with being a leader, but it also presents a lesson to the community.

The Jewish people of the desert are not our role models for a healthy community. Time and again they remain self-centred and unable to learn and grow. Ultimately, due to these failures and to their failure to recognize Miriam as the exceptional person she was, they do not enter the land of Israel.

The Talmud states that anyone appointed over a community becomes a slave to that community. Yet we must always remember that the Torah has strict rules protecting the dignity of the slave.

Masorti Judaism offers alternative for secular Israelis

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Like many Israelis who choose not to marry under the auspices of the Orthodox rabbinate, Rabbi Ehud Bandel – president of Israel's Masorti (Conservative) movement – and his wife of eight years have a civil marriage certificate from another country, in their case Japan, where Rabbi Bandel's wife was studying at the time.

Unlike some Israelis who marry elsewhere, they do have a Jewish marriage document, but the ketubah that testifies to their Masorti (Conservative) chuppah is not recognized in Israel. (Civil and non-Orthodox Jewish marriages are recognized by Israel only if they were performed outside of the country.)

Rabbi Ehud Bandel

Yet, more and more Israelis are seeing Masorti weddings as an option, said Rabbi Bandel in an interview at the Inn on the Park Hotel, when he was in town for the Rabbinical Assembly convention at the beginning of June.

In fact, he officiated at three weddings the week before he came to Toronto.

"Israelis are beginning to realize the importance for them of having a meaningful religious ceremony, but one they can identify with, with a rabbi they can relate to."

While it can be disheartening to have a religious ceremony such as marriage or conversion not recognized as valid, the Masorti movement suffered a different kind of blow last year when its Ya'ar Ramot Synagogue was torched.

In May, the perpetrators were convicted and sentenced to three years in jail.

But Rabbi Bandel, 45, who was the first sabra to be ordained as a Masorti rabbi in Israel in 1988, says he likes to look at the cup as half-full, not half-empty. Two nights after the fire, a support rally was held in the courtyard of the synagogue – to enable Orthodox Jews who offered support but would not enter the Masorti building to attend.

In the past nine months of the ongoing intifadah, Rabbi Bandel's work – like the work and life of all Israelis – has become more challenging. "[But] I don't want to allow our enemies the victory of distracting us from our daily routine."

A second-generation Jerusalemite who grew up "totally secular," Rabbi Bandel believes the Masorti movement has an important role to play in strengthening Jewish identity by exposing more Israelis to Jewish tradition.

For many Israelis, he said, just crossing the threshold of a synagogue is something they have never done. In fact, he noted, on Rosh Hashanah there are more Israelis on the beach than in all the synagogues in Israel.

> 'They are beginning to realize importance of having a meaningful religious ceremony.'

From his standpoint, Masorti presents "an alternative to this either/or approach: Orthodoxy or total secularism. For years there's been an unholy alliance between Orthodox and secular. It resulted in most Israelis, the vast majority, being known as chiloni [secular]. We see this as a very dangerous phenomenon for the future of the Jewish state and the Jewish character of the Jewish state."

It is also dangerous for the future relations between Israelis and Diaspora Jews, he believes. "If Israelis see their Judaism only in national terms...then we are losing the common language. I am concerned about this."

It's important for Diaspora Jews to ensure there is a strong Masorti movement in Israel, he said, adding that it's no secret financial resources are needed. "Orthodox institutions get their money from the government," he pointed out.

Over the past three decades, Masorti, which has grown to more than 50 synagogues along with a system of schools and youth groups in Israel, has undergone a shift from its North American roots. "The movement is no longer seen as an American import."

In some congregations, Rabbi Bandel said, 60 percent of the congregants are not "Anglo-Saxon," as English-speakers are known in Israel. They include sabras, Sephardi Jews and new immigrants from South America and the former Soviet Union.

While Masorti still has a long way to go, said the rabbi, Israelis have begun to realize that they've "lost out by giving Orthodoxy a monopoly on Judaism." His goal is to draw the secular community back to tradition.

Survivor to serve on Claims Conference board

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the first time, a Holocaust survivor will represent Canada at the board of the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany.

Michael Rosenberg, president of Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada, will take his place at the board table when the New York-based claims conference meets next month in Washington, D.C.

Traditionally, Canada has been allotted two seats at the board, which numbers between 40 and 50 and is dominated by the United States and Israel. Since the claims conference began in 1951 to negotiate with Germany for reparations and restitution for survivors, Canada has been represented by the top two officials of Canadian Jewish Congress – its president and top professional – through CJC's affiliation with the World Jewish Congress.

But recently, Jack Silverstone, CJC's national executive vice-president, relinquished his seat to Rosenberg. Canada's other representative at the claims conference board is current CJC president Keith Landy.

"I felt good about giving up my seat," Silverstone told The CJN. "I was glad to do it. [Former CJC president] Moshe Ronen and I felt it was about time to bring a survivor on board, and that it was entirely appropriate."

He said the board decided months ago to appoint four survivors, but there were no guarantees any would come from Canada.

Rosenberg said he has two main priorities.

One is to convince local institutions that work with survivors to fully tap into funds the claims conference has available.

"Places like Baycrest, Circle of Care and Jewish Family & Child Service don't always take full advantage of the health funding the claims conference offers," Rosenberg said, explaining such funds are available for physical and mental health care.

He's now putting together a brief to be sent out to local agencies apprising them of the availability of the funds.

Another priority is the start of payouts to Nazi-era slave labourers.

Compensation from the $7.9 billion (Cdn) fund established by Germany and German industries is expected to begin later this summer. But, Rosenberg explained, former slaves will, at first, receive only half their payments of roughly $10,000 each until all recipients get a cheque. Then, the other half will be sent out.

It's not an issue before the claims conference, but Rosenberg decried the massive fees paid to U.S. lawyers who worked on the compensation package.

Recent reports said 51 lawyers who represented survivors in the class action lawsuit against Germany will split $60 million (US), with 11 lawyers to earn more than $1 million each in fees. The biggest chunk will go to a New York attorney who will get $7.3 million.

"The [one-time] slaves are getting roughly 20 cents an hour for their suffering, and the lawyers are getting millions. This is a blood stain on lawyers," Rosenberg said. No Canadian lawyers will benefit from the German compensation package.

The claims conference's next meeting will take place July 16-18, and will mark its 50th anniversary.

Rabbi Bielfeld retires after 33 years at shul

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld came to Temple Emanu-El 33 years ago, he did not view it as a long-term position.

"I had learned early on from my father not to anticipate too much in the way of the future, to hope for the best and to settle for what I get. Therefore, I had no thoughts on the duration of my stay," said the rabbi, who is retiring at the end of this month.

Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld

Rabbi Bielfeld, a native of Worcester, Mass. went to Yale University and Harvard Law school before attending Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati, where he was ordained in 1964.

While serving a congregation in Chicago, he heard about "a small congregation in an exotic place called Willowdale, Ont. that was looking for a rabbi.

"When I arrived here, I was whisked away to a suite at the Inn on the Park, where I concluded that if all Canadians were as charming and devoted as the [men who interviewed me], it might be a wise decision making this my home."

When he started at the temple, which now has about 400 member families, it was one-half its size physically, and one-quarter its size in members. It began to grow after an amalgamation with the former Temple Beth El in Don Mills.

"Temple Beth El was a more traditional synagogue, and when its members joined us, we thought of them as the leaven in the dough. They added an infusion of traditional attitudes and values."

The reasons that people have joined the temple have undergone "a sea change in the three-plus decades I have been here.

"In the '60s, '70s and '80s, in addition to looking for a spiritual home, people were looking for a social environment where they could develop close personal ties and a strong connection to other families.

"Perhaps because more and more families have both parents working, and perhaps because children are more intensely programmed, synagogues are no longer a magnet for social cohesion."

Today, he says, the synagogue has become a place to fulfil spiritual needs, perform life-cycle events, and provide an academic or intellectual connection. "They are not the social community they once were."

Rabbi Bielfeld grew up in a home strongly committed to social justice, and his rabbinate has been characterized by an emphasis on social justice and an understanding of the inter-relationship between being Jewish and being Canadian, he says.

One of his proudest moments was when he marched with Martin Luther King into areas of Chicago that were quite hostile to Blacks and Jews. "He was certainly an influence on my life, as was Rabbi Jacob Weinstein, my senior rabbi in Chicago. He was one of the greatest activists in the Jewish community in the 20th century."

Among Rabbi Bielfeld's activities, he is founding member and chairman of the board of Leo Baeck Day School; a past member of the executive of the North York committee on community, race and ethnic relations; founding member and past chairman of the board of Mazon Canada – a Jewish Response to Hunger; and a past board member of Casey House.

Together with his congregation and other faith leaders, he organized the Campaign Against Child Poverty, a national effort to address the plight of millions of Canadian children living below the poverty line.

"I have always understood Judaism to be an amalgam of ritual, spiritual experience and a strong commitment to those less fortunate – those who occupy the margins of society.

"A rabbinic dictum says that it is forbidden to pray in a sanctuary where there are no windows because we must always be able to include in our prayers an awareness of the world in which we are praying.

"I think that the synagogue has been influenced by my sense of social justice and has been responsive to it."

When he first arrived at Temple Emanu-El during the Vietnam war, Rabbi Bielfeld became aware of a significant number of draft resisters living in the city, he says.

"One of my first activities was to invite members of the congregation to bring food and clothing to these people. I was impressed by the members' commitment to the cause, and it wasn't until years later that I discovered the huge response was because they did not want to offend the new American rabbi."

In the past 30 years however, the congregants have increasingly identified themselves with social activism, he says. "This congregation decided early on to attempt to do things others said were impossible.

"We were one of the first congregations to phone Jews in the former Soviet Union and to establish contact with Refuseniks. We also helped bring over Vietnamese boat people. We divided the congregation up in groups, and these groups put up money to guarantee the Vietnamese entrance into the country."

They brought over some of the first Ethiopian Jews, before Israel opened its gates to large numbers of them, says Rabbi Bielfeld.

The Campaign Against Child Poverty has spread to other religious denominations and social and civic groups. "It has become a national movement dedicated to the eradication of poverty in Canada."

In his retirement, he says, he is interested in exploring new dimensions of activity while maintaining his involvement in the campaign.

His replacement, Rabbi Debra Landsberg who starts in early August, is currently associate rabbi at The Temple in Atlanta, Ga. "She is a sensitive and Jewishly-knowledgeable person who comes with a great recommendation."

Reform Jewish camp proving popular, says director

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Camp George, the first Canadian camp in the Reform Jewish camping system, is quickly becoming the place to be, says its director Jack Feldman.

The camp, located near Parry Sound, opened in 1999 with 263 campers from grades two to 10, and 50 staff. This year there are 525 campers and 140 program staff with a waiting list of 60 campers.

Camp staff includes an educational director, tfillot co-ordinator, song leaders, sports activity leaders, and a faculty of Reform rabbis and cantors who provide religious and cultural programming.

The camp serves as a kosher winter retreat serving a variety of Jewish and secular organizations. A camp steering committee also runs Camp Yossi, a day camp which serves as a feeder camp for Camp George.

Feldman, 43, a social worker, has been involved in Ontario camps for over 30 years, and is a former director of Camp B'nai Brith in Alberta. He has been full-time director of Camp George since its inaugural season.

The camp's philosophy, he said, is to provide children with the opportunity to live a Jewish life at camp, "to be immersed in it – not have camp in one corner and Judaism in another. We offer a seamless integration of the two."

There was clearly a demand in the Reform community for such a camp, said Feldman. "The alternatives were Conservative camps or Zionist camps, nothing in Canada that was specifically Reform."

The camp's growth has created a need to expand, he said, and a camp development committee has been formed with Rabbi Gunther Plaut, senior scholar at Holy Blossom Temple, as its honorary chair.

A five-year expansion plan includes all aspects of the camp's operation including the physical plant, living accommodations, program areas, staffing, meeting space, infrastructure, administrative support, staff training and recreation.

Rabbi Plaut said "from the exodus from Egypt, through our rare biblical victories, to the emergence of Israel itself ... Judaic history has been an unending quest for personal, national and religious self-esteem.

"Today, that search has proved most compelling among our youth, using summer camps as a growing vehicle to discover a new heritage and vision of Judaism that was often unattainable to their parents and relatives."

In Canada, he said, Camp George has become a growing and powerful engine in this historic search for Jewish self-esteem and identity.

"As the first Reform Jewish camp in the country, its programs have already touched thousands of young Jews with a rare blend of summer fun, Judaic education and day-by-day social activities that go beyond those offered by many of today's homes and synagogues," he said.

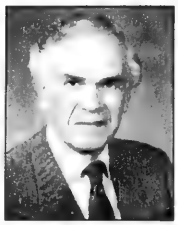
Scholars win top awards

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two Canadian Jewish scholars have won this year's Killam Prize for distinguished lifetime achievement.

They are Norbert Morgenstern of Edmonton and Ronald Melzack of Montreal.



Norbert Morgenstern

The prize, worth $100,000, is awarded for career achievement in the natural sciences, health sciences and engineering. Administered by the Canada Council for the Arts, it was created to honour Canadians actively engaged in research.

Morgenstern, a pre-eminent civil engineer, is a professor emeritus at the University of Alberta. Before his resignation in 1999, he was chair of the department of civil and environmental engineering. He remains active in research and consulting.

With almost 300 research papers to his credit, Morgenstern has written on topics ranging from geo-technical aspects of oil sand development to slope stability.

He holds honorary degrees from the University of Toronto and Queen's University.

Ronald Melzack

Melzack, a McGill University psychologist, is a specialist in pain.

He developed the McGill Pain Questionnaire, now the most widely used measuring tool for research on pain in human beings.

He has studied labour pain, phantom limb pain and morphine analgesia during palliative care.

A Fellow of the Royal Society of Canada, he is the recipient of an honorary degree from the University of Waterloo.

The Killam Prizes, established in 1981, are financed through funds donated to the Canada Council by the late Dorothy Killam in honour of her husband, Izaak Walton Killam.

Scientists do not apply for the prize, but are nominated by specialists in their field. Winners are selected by an interdisciplinary committee consisting of scientists from across Canada.

Students view war through eyes of author

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – A Grade 3 class at Eitz Chaim had the rare opportunity to learn first-hand what it was like for girls their age to live through the war years in London, England.

Suzanne Burger, the girls' teacher, heard about an unpublished manuscript, I'll Never Go Back, by Kitty Simmonds Wintrob. The manuscript tells of Wintrob's experience as an eight-year-old Jewish child who was evacuated during the war and lived through the Blitz. The book reflects on the child's strength and humour in overcoming separation from her family and living in a world turned upside down.

"Overwhelmed" with the manuscript, Burger asked the author's permission to read the story to her class. Every week, Burger read to the students and had the girls illustrate their visions of the characters and scenes in each chapter, since the manuscript does not have art work.

"The results were spectacular!" says Burger. The students wanted to meet the author, so Burger arranged for Wintrob to visit Eitz Chaim's Viewmount Branch one afternoon to speak to the girls and to answer their many questions.

Wintrob, who is visually impaired, recalled how she tearfully said good-bye to her mother at the train station. The students asked about her many adventures in several foster homes north of London and her attempts to run back to her home.

"Kitty's visit was like magic," says Burger. "She spoke with excitement and emotion. The girls wanted to know how it [felt] to be in a strange home. Why did she run away twice? What happened to her roommate Sadie Davidovich and her Uncle Yudi?

"It was a great afternoon and an amazing opportunity for readers to meet an author."

Bracha Kahan, a student in Burger's class, describes the story as "interesting – sometimes sad and sometimes very funny. We could relate to being sent away from parents to live with strangers who treated her badly."

Bracha says that when Wintrob came to class, "the story came to life. The funniest thing was a song Kitty wrote in the story about one of the ladies who treated her badly. She sang the funny song beautifully and we all really laughed hard."

The nine-year-old student said that she had a lot of feeling for the author. "She had to sleep in the subway station. It was scary for her. We learned how the Blitz felt. It was an amazing book and her visit was great."

Asper slams Canada's Mideast policy

Canada, he said, "should know" that:

- Arafat is a "pathological liar who has always sought and will continue to seek not justice for his people, but only the destruction of the State of Israel. Any peace agreements are only a temporary stop along the way."
- Contrary to the Oslo peace accords, Arafat's "schools, mosques, state-owned newspapers and broadcasters continue to preach incitement, hatred and the benefits of martyrdom in heaven for Palestinians willing to die in the holy cause of killing Israelis and Jews, wherever they may be found."
- Arafat "continues to refuse to account for how he has spent the billions he's received for humanitarian aid, including money from Canada." It has "been proven" that some of the funds have been spent on establishing "terror-training camps" for schoolchildren, and that Arafat's personal "secret" bank accounts are "reported to be in the billions."
- The Palestinian leader has "emptied jails of captured terrorists" and is arming and encouraging them to carry out attacks against Israel "from the territory turned over to him by a compliant Israel."
- The "most virulent" attacks against Israeli citizens are "carried out by Arafat's personal guard force and militias entirely within his control."

Israel Asper

It is "time for a change in Canadian foreign policy," Asper stated. "It is not too late to regain our honour and integrity."

In the CJN interview, Asper also criticized some of the media coverage of the Mideast conflict, particularly CBC Television, which he termed "outrageous." He noted that the national broadcaster aired footage of Manley with Arafat and visiting Arab hospitals and damaged areas, but didn't show Manley's meetings with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon or his visits to Jewish casualties. "In that sense, the coverage has been biased," Asper said.

The National Post (50 percent of which is owned by CanWest) has been "extremely accurate and fair," he stated. Asked whether the publication has a pro-Israel bias, Asper countered that the Post is "biased by the facts. We have a connection to the Jerusalem Post. We read all the Arab propaganda. And we read all the Israeli material. This is no Jewish conspiracy. This is from journalists who aren't Jewish, who simply look for the facts."

Asper declined to elaborate on government feedback about his speech. "I want to be guarded here, because I don't want to prejudice discussions. I'll just answer by simply saying yes [there has been feedback]."

He was "disappointed" by condemnation of his speech by the Canadian Islamic Congress. "This is not an anti-Arab speech," he told The CJN. "It's an anti-terrorist speech. If Arabs fall into that category, then, just as if they were of any other extraction, I would be saying the same thing."

"I felt it was time that somebody spoke out," Asper said. "I have not been entirely happy with the organizations that are charged with the responsibilities of making the case for Israel, even though I've spoken with them. There has not been enough said, not only in the defence of Israel, but the criticism against the position the Canadian government has taken."

Asper said he's "the first to concede" that the Canadian government has been very helpful to Israel, as evidenced by the free trade agreement between the two countries.

But he is "unsatisfied" by successful Canadian efforts to change the language of the UN and other resolutions to condemn terrorism on all sides, not just condemning Israel. "There is no moral equivalency here."

Israelis, he specified, are "responding to provocative attacks."

Arafat has declared war, stated Asper in his speech. "Therefore Israel is entitled to conduct itself and its defence accordingly."

Asper also criticized as "fairweather friends of Israel" – Diaspora Jews who have cancelled or refused to make trips there. He singled out in particular the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, the Reform organization that suspended all its teen programs to Israel this summer, for its "precipitous cowering," and praised Canadians for continuing to show solidarity by visiting the Jewish State.

A longtime supporter of the Hebrew University, Asper has donated $5 million for the establishment of the Asper Centre for Entrepreneurship, which will be modelled on the centre of the same name at the University of Manitoba.

Living in Thunder Bay

By JEREMY SILVER
Special to The CJN

Opinion

When I moved from Toronto to Thunder Bay (population: small; Jewish population: seemed like one – me) I expected to work hard in school, learn to be independent, meet new people, etc. etc. The last thing I expected was to be singled out and subjected to the torrent of Jewish jokes and icy stares that came my way because of my Jewish background. Being Jewish among people who had never seen "a Jew" before, made me feel isolated and lonely. In the end, however, my experience taught me a lot about myself and about the importance of retaining my religion, and I think my very presence and personality taught others something as well. Here are some of my most memorable experiences.

There was one night that I remember quite clearly. I was out for dinner with some friends. One was searching through her purse for her pay cheque, and when she found it she said, "Look at this, they Jewed me." She didn't know I was Jewish and continued to complain about her boss. I told her I was Jewish and that the comments offended me. Well, the look on her face was priceless – she couldn't believe it. After all, there were so few Jews in T. Bay. The Star of David that I wear around my neck wasn't enough proof for her.

Now if that wasn't bad enough, you should have seen my Passover. Even though there's a small Jewish community I couldn't even find matzah in T. Bay. I walked into the local A&P and asked the grocer where the matzah was. "Matzah? It's in the dairy section."

"The dairy section?" I asked. "Why would it be there?"

He led me to the fridge and handed me a brick of cheese. "Here is your mozzarella Do you need anything else?"

In the end, my mom sent me kosher care packages in the mail.

Passover was definitely a hard time for me. Whereas my family was in Toronto having a huge seder, for the first time, I ate alone. My first seder consisted of me sitting in front of several mirrors so that I could feel as if I had some company. It was the first year everybody was on the same page and on cue. I didn't bother hiding the Afikoman – my dorm room was so small that it wouldn't have been a worthwhile challenge to search for it.

Now that I'm back in Toronto for the summer I've had some time to reflect on my experiences. I've since realized that nobody at school meant to hurt me with their insensitive comments – they simply didn't know any better. But I believe my being on campus helped sensitize them to a new religion and culture. For instance, by the time Passover had rolled around, some students in residence were asking to try my matzah – and they liked it. Maybe next year there will be enough of a demand for matzah that the A&P will have some in stock. Maybe the grocers will even know what it is.

Kahan's still feisty at 93

By BEN ROSE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Gert Kahan has been fighting for women's liberation all her life, and at 93 she is still at it. She lives alone in a comfortable apartment in Harbour Square on the waterfront and attends lectures about current events twice a week at Ryerson University, besides taking part in Ryerson Recollections, in which she tells her own story. She does her own shopping and cooks her own meals.

But life at one time was hard for the woman who never went to school in Bessarabia, where she was born, or in Canada. She taught herself to read and write English. At one point, when she worked in a sweatshop on Spadina Avenue, she was told by men working there that "you only need to earn enough to buy lipstick so you can practice your other trades."

"I'm happy to see that some Jewish women have successful careers," she said.

"When I was young there was no such thing as feminism. But Jewish women have not yet reached a plateau where they can get out of a lousy marriage. They still have a way to go."

She is proud that her youngest grandson, an electrical engineer, cooks and washes dishes alongside his wife, who has a PhD and is also an electrical engineer. But Kahan believes that not enough Jewish men are "house broken."

Kahan is a feisty, independent sort, often taking issue with what her professors at Ryerson say in lectures, and expressing her own opinion forthrightly.

She still makes wall hangings, which are privately sold, enjoys sewing and reading, particularly about law. "I'm a slow reader but I like to read books [that] dissect famous trials."

Of her own marriage, she said she still feels guilty about putting her husband, Myer, into a home because he had Alzheimer's disease and needed the day and night care of two people. Her husband, who owned a large company, Myer's Dress, died eight years ago. She was the company's designer.

"He was a sensitive and fine man, at one time a men's tailor, who had no stomach for the union wars on Spadina Avenue. But he was a good friend of the late J.B. Salsberg and once loaned him 25 cents which J.B. needed badly."

At 25, she opened a dress store on Yonge Street when her husband couldn't find a job. They lived above the store so she could run upstairs to look after her babies. To do this, she passed up an opportunity to earn $45 a week as a dress designer.

She is proud of her oldest son, William, who wears two hats as a mathematician and computer scientist in California, and her youngest son, Frederick, a biochemist in New Jersey.

She has four great granddaughters and two great grandsons.

Celebrating 50 years of Israel Bonds

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA – Israel needs the support of Diaspora Jewry more now than ever, as the country draws strength from the special bond shared by Jews around the world, said Israeli Ambassador Haim Divon at a recent 50th anniversary of State of Israel Bonds reception.

"When I am standing here among friends – not just friends, but family – involved, committed, caring, I know that... we will be able to endure because today we need the strength, not just to go on, [but also to] exercise restraint," said Divon.

"That takes extra strength, courage and leadership and we can do it only when we know that you are here with us, not just strengthening our economy by buying bonds, but by telling all your friends and colleagues what a difficult neighbourhood we are living in ... We cannot do it alone. We need each and every one of you with us."

Dr. Norman Barwin thanked Divon for his message. "You have shown us so eloquently the role of Israel Bonds in the history of Israel," he said.

The ambassador's sentiments were echoed by Rabbi Reuven Bulka who has recently completed his term as rabbinic chair of State of Israel Bonds.

"All of this [the violence in Israel] has obliterated the left and the right," said Rabbi Bulka. "Everyone is on [the same] side. Everyone is deeply committed. We realize that we are up against an implacable enemy. For us here in Canada and around the world, there is a left and a right. The left is that we have to make sure that Israel is not left alone. The right is that we have to do what is right by Israel. You can do no better in establishing that linkage with Israel than to buy bonds."

Aboriginal youth group aids Holocaust centre

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

TORONTO — Handing over a cheque to the chairman of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre at a recent ceremony marked a proud accomplishment in the lives of 13 Aboriginal youths.

As part of Completing the Circle, a six-month program held at the Native Men's Residence, or Na-Me-Res, a shelter and educational centre for urban Aboriginal youth at risk, these youths sold chocolates and raised $326.50 which they donated to the Holocaust centre in Toronto.

Marcia Tait, 20, a mother of a 19-month-old daughter, is taking computer courses at Na-Me-Res. She says she was glad to give back to the Jewish community after Ve'ahavta,the Canadian Jewish humanitarian and relief organization, donated a van to Street Help, a Na-Me-Res outreach program that delivers food and clothing to Toronto's homeless.

But the desire to raise money for the Holocaust centre has deeper, more personal roots for many of these Natives who feel that their people, like Jews, have suffered from racism throughout their history.

"We were forced to live on land that wasn't really ours. We lived on little pieces of land and could only hunt there," explains Tait.

"The government stole little children from their homes and sent them to residential schools," she continues. "Children were whipped and hit if they spoke their native tongue."

While Tait was born and raised in Toronto, she says her mother was sent to a residential school but hated it so much that at the age of six she ran away, miraculously making it from the school in Alaska to her home in British Columbia.

Even today, Tait says she and other Natives still experience racism.

"Sometimes I'll be walking down the street and I'll hear people say, 'She's a drunken Native.' But I'm a mother and a student – not all Indians are like that."

Brandy Buswa, another Completing the Circle participant, says she felt privileged to have done something good for the Jewish community.

Howard Driman, chair of the Holocaust centre, was pleased to accept the donation, saying that he was "extremely touched" by the contribution.

Torah dedicated in Ottawa

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA – Amid a sea of dancing rabbis followed by a parade of joyous community members, a new Torah was held aloft under the chupah, the culmination of a year-long wait for the "bride" to arrive from Israel.

The Ottawa Torah Centre Chabad (OTC) recently invited the entire community to participate in the completion ceremony as the last few letters of the Torah were inked in by Torah scribe Rabbi Ephraim Schmukler.

This follows the custom of purposely leaving the new Torah incomplete in order to allow people the honour of personally standing by the scribe as he meticulously completes his task. Community leaders and those who had donated money to purchase a letter, a word or phrase were called up to take their places by his side.

"Our sages have taught that every Jew has his or her very own letter in the Torah," said Rabbi Blum of the OTC. "Indeed, the final mitzvah of the 613 in the Torah is the imperative to write one's own Torah." The Torah was written in Israel, a process that took almost a year. Every letter written by hand, it comprises 250 columns representing the five books of Moses and covers 85 panels of parchment joined to make the scroll.

Rabbi Blum was thrilled with the large turnout on a sunny Sunday afternoon in June.

"It is a very special time for me and for the OTC," he said, "as this is the next step to the development of our Chabad House and our organization."

For the past three years, Rabbi Blum has been holding services in his home on Shabbat and holidays and has organized Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur services in a community centre in suburban Barrhaven.

He hopes that one day the new Torah will be housed in a synagogue building which will serve the quickly expanding neighbourhood in south west Ottawa.

Billed as a "Grand CommUnity Torah Celebration," the event was held in the auditorium of Hillel Academy and attracted a wide range of participants. According to Rabbi Blum, the Torah belongs to the entire community, and he wanted everyone to share in the joy of welcoming the new scroll. There were refreshments as well as activities for children

Counsellor Amir Maimon of the Israeli Embassy brought greetings, as did John Baird, MP. Baird presented a certificate of congratulations to Rabbi Blum and joined the parade as it followed a band of musicians along the street to Hillel Lodge, the Jewish seniors' residence next door. There it was placed in the ark in the home's chapel before being taken to its new home in Barrhaven..

Community has summer work ahead

Summer months are traditionally spent shifting into low gear and grabbing as much "r & r" as possible before the frenetic pace re-asserts itself in September. Frankly speaking, your faithful scribe is not sure that the Jewish community can be afforded the luxury of whiling away those lazy, hazy days of summer.

One example from among many will explain why.

The Bloc Quebecois met in conference a couple of weeks back. Among the policies being debated at this 10th anniversary convention was the BQ policy on the Middle East. There is an important group within the Bloc caucus that is very supportive of Israel. Many of them, including current leader, Gilles Duceppe, have travelled to Israel with groups like the Canada-Israel Committee. So why would a nasty, anti-Israel resolution materialize at the policy debate?

The answer, of course, is that the BQ has made a determined effort to reach out to the ethnic communities of Quebec. One of the doors on which they knocked was that of the Arab and Palestinian communities. Guess what? The door was opened... and not just by one individual!

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

The hostile resolution was evidence of the significant Arab presence within the BQ membership. More to the point, it was an indication of the Arab community's strategic choice to exercise its democratic right to express concern about a particular issue and have that concern reflected in the party's political manifesto.

Only the timely intervention of some sympathetic players within the party bureaucracy and caucus averted adoption of that resolution. The Jewish community should not assume that such support will be able to withstand the determined efforts of Arab and Palestinian Canadians indefinitely.

This tale can be repeated for every caucus represented in Parliament. The irony is that the Jewish community leadership can boast of warm relations with most elites within the various parties. It is on the grassroots level that the ties have atrophied and, in some cases, disappeared entirely. And that is where the focus of any remedial efforts must begin.

The one saving grace is that all of the political parties are in a state of transition. Now is the time to establish, renew or expand the Jewish presence in each of them. There are a lot of issues on the Jewish agenda, many of which are partisan in nature. But the only way such concerns will be heard is if a visible Jewish presence is at the table to make them heard. That takes some planning and a whole lot of determination.

The extent to which the summer months are used to put a real plan in place will determine the effectiveness of Canadian Jewry's voice over the next many summers.

Diabetics told to be responsible for themselves

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The message is clear: If you have diabetes, you are the one responsible for knowing how to care for it and ensuring that everything necessary is done.

Nurse Marty Campbell, a longtime diabetes educator at TRIDEC, a program of Mount Sinai, Women's College and Toronto hospitals, told a recent meeting of the Jewish chapter of the Canadian Diabetes Association that while hospitals, doctors and diabetes educators can answer questions and give advice, and one shouldn't hesitate to ask questions, ultimately "you are the ones with diabetes. You have to take control."

She supplied a chart listing the different tests and treatments that should be carried out, as well as a schedule for doing them.

First and foremost is controlling the body's glucose levels. The ideal, she said, is a level of between four and seven mmol/L (three to seven milligrams of sugar per decilitre of blood) before meals, and under 11 after, but "these levels are targets. Everyone is an individual."

A physician or diabetes educator will suggest how often the blood glucose levels should be checked and the best time of day to do it. Insulin dependent diabetics may have to adjust their insulin accordingly.

At present, levels are checked by pricking the finger and putting the blood into a glucometer. Campbell noted that new technology is being developed, including a sensor that will be worn for three days and record levels every few minutes. When the sensor is removed, it will be plugged into a computer for analysis.

Another piece of technology under development in the United States is the gluco-watch, which tests the fluid under the skin. Unfortunately, she said, there are some problems involved with it, such as the fact that the findings are affected by perspiration.

Another means of checking blood glucose levels is the glycosylated hemoglobin test (HgbAlc test), which will show what the blood sugar has been like over the past three months.

"Any decrease has benefits for you, whether it has gone down to a normal seven, or it has gone from 11 to 10," Campbell emphasized. However, if it is going up and nothing else is changing, that should be discussed with a doctor.

Because heart attack and stroke are possible complications of diabetes, it is very important to ensure that the blood pressure is controlled at 130/85. "If not, you should take a blood pressure medication," she said.

Foot care is critical to diabetes management, since diabetes can cause serious problems with blood circulation and the healing of wounds. Feet should be examined regularly to make sure that there are no changes and to check what is happening with blisters, cuts, scratches or rashes. Once a year, Campbell said, the feet should be seen by a doctor.

Since diabetics are also at higher risk for heart disease, lipids (blood fats) should be checked once a year, too. "Keep a copy of every lab result you ever take," Campbell advised, so that you will have proof of changes to your body's functioning.

While maintaining a healthy weight is important in the care of diabetes (returning to a proper weight can even allow one to stop taking insulin or other medications), Campbell acknowledged that "health professionals are not successful at helping people lose weight."

People should know what's "realistic and healthy," she said.

Regular screening for depression is important, Campbell said, noting that one in three diabetics is depressed, perhaps not clinically so, but "filled with sadness, or overwhelmed at the problems of controlling the disease."

People should recognize that "living with diabetes is a challenge. For some, it is more of a challenge than for others."

Other tests should include kidney and liver function tests, eye examinations (changes in the eye caused by uncontrolled diabetes can lead to blindness), regular dental exams and an annual flu shot.

She said the question of whether people should be under the care of a general practitioner or an endocrinologist is "politically and economically loaded."

The Canadian Diabetes Association is making a concerted effort to see that all doctors are brought "up to snuff" on current knowledge and practice in the field, Campbell said.

Time to change your relationship with food

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The secret to successful weight loss is to change your relationship with food, says Dr. Barry Simon, a psychiatrist specializing in weight management.

"A knowledge of food is not enough; you need to change how you look at it," he said at a panel discussion sponsored by Mount Sinai Hospital. Also on the panel, part of Mount Sinai's Healthy Living lecture series, were Carol Greenwood, an associate professor, department of nutritional sciences, faculty of medicine, University of Toronto; and Fran Berkoff, a dietitian at Mount Sinai Hospital.

Simon, an author and columnist with the Toronto Star, and a consultant to the diabetic clinic at Mount Sinai, said that before embarking on a weight loss program, people should examine their reasons for wanting to lose weight.

"Weight loss alone is not motivational; you should make a list of how your life would change if you did lose weight. You might want to be able to walk more easily, or have more zip in your step...Close your eyes and come up with a realistic image of what you'll enjoy when you've lost some of the weight. If you do not make a list, you will not feel motivated," he said.

He also suggested making a list about what is preventing you from losing weight. "In that list are all the barriers to success. This tells you what you need to change in order to lose weight.

"If, for example you eat because you are frustrated, you need to find out why you are frustrated. [Pay attention] to those reasons because they mean you must make changes."

Most people berate themselves for not losing weight, and then they feel sad and frustrated. This often leads to overeating, he said.

"You should think of a way that you have motivated yourself in other ways, or how you have motivated others. Think of someone who coaches well, and [reflect on] what they do," he said.

Lapses are a learning experience, he said."They are windows to your soul. If you are about to eat for emotional reasons, ask yourself in a coach voice what is really bothering you. What are you feeling or thinking? What happens inside you when you slip up?"

Berkoff said that when making food choices, labels can be trusted. "They meet government regulations. Remember, however, that labels refer to food as they are packaged – not with added milk, eggs or oil. Think about the end product.

"You also need to remember that when a label says a product is light, it could mean light in colour, texture or taste. Read the fine print. Also remember that fat free is not calorie free, and cholesterol free is not fat free," she said.

Greenwood, who spoke about linking diet to memory loss in seniors, said that there is evidence that people with the lowest vitamin intake show the poorest performance on memory tests.

Powell heads to Middle East to push both sides

By ALUF BENN and SHLOMO SHAMIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon set off on a short visit to the United States last Sunday, at the start of what was expected to be a crucial week of diplomacy and a preamble to Secretary of State Colin Powell's visit to the region later in the week.

Diplomatic sources in Jerusalem said special American envoy William Burns has briefed Sharon and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat on an American timetable to implement the Mitchell plan. Powell is expected to demand a clear answer on whether both sides accept the plan.

Israel is stepping up pressure on Arafat to consolidate the ceasefire and arrest Palestinian activists. In a telephone conversation last week, Avi Dichter, head of the Shin Bet security services, warned Arafat that unless Palestinians on an Israeli "wanted" list are arrested immediately, "Israel will have to take steps for its self-defence."

The prime minister arrived in New York Sunday.

Powell has a meeting scheduled with Arafat this Thursday, when he will officially present him with Washington's plan. He will then leave for a 24-hour visit to Saudi Arabia before returning to hear the response of each side in meetings with Sharon and Arafat.

Sharon was planning, during his visit to Washington, to ask for a "cooling off" period before starting to implement the Mitchell plan.

Diplomatic sources said the United States is exercising pressure on both the Palestinians and Israel. The PA is being asked to carry out the ceasefire agreement brokered by CIA director George Tenet, and Israel is being told that the countdown of any "cooling off" period must begin now.

Sharon was expected to demand a 10-day period in which an absolute ceasefire must be observed, and only then would he agree to a "cooling-off period."

During a meeting with Burns last Friday, Sharon clarified to the United States that he believes a 10-day period in which there must be "100 percent quiet, not 100 percent effort" is necessary in order to examine whether Arafat is fulfilling his part of the ceasefire deal.

'100 percent quiet, not 100 percent effort'

A senior diplomatic source in Jerusalem said the Palestinian leader will make the utmost effort to maintain quiet on the ground while the visit of the U.S. secretary of state is pending, so that implementing the Mitchell plan will be expedited.

For its part, Israel is applying its own pressure on Arafat. Shin Bet chief Avi Dichter last Friday called Jibril Rajoub, the Palestinian preventive security chief in the West Bank, and spoke with Arafat, who happened to be visiting at the time. A senior source in the prime minister's delegation to Washington said that Dichter, supported by Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, issued the warning to the Palestinians and asked that the wanted terrorists be arrested within 24 hours.

"These persons were not arrested and an order for their arrest was not issued," the sources said.

When asked how long Israel planned to continue with its policy of restraint, the source said that "Israel has two possibilities. The one is to attack the Palestinian Authority from Rafiah to Gaza and from Hebron to Jenin, and go full force. The other option is to act differently. The cabinet heard, voted and decided last Wednesday to place the maximum effort on defending the citizens of Israel, to put special effort into safeguarding the highways, and, yes, Israel will exercise its right to self-defence."

The same source added: "I hope that so long as it is possible not to embark on a total assault, we will continue. We have an interest in an agreement."

The senior source said Arafat has not made any changes in his stance. "There are fewer incidents on the ground, but if Arafat wants it to be completely quiet, as it is today in Bethlehem and Beit Jala, it will be. If Arafat does not understand now that there is a need for a complete ceasefire, he will never understand this."

The main points of the American plan, which will supplement the Mitchell committee recommendations, are as follows:

- The U.S. will declare the start of the "cooling-off" period. It will likely be shorter than Israel would like to see – about five weeks.
- During this period, both sides will undertake measures to restore the situation in the territories to pre-intifadah status.
- Three months of confidence-building measures (CBMs) will ensue. Israel will be required to freeze all settlement building and the Palestinians will have to collect all illegal weapons, renew security co-operation and develop a single command and control structure for its various security organizations.
- It is unclear whether the United States will demand a full freeze of settlement building or accept the Peres-Sharon formula that maintains only construction beyond the fences of the settlements will be frozen.
- Israel will carry out the third stage of withdrawal in the West Bank.
- At the completion of the CBMs, final status negotiations will resume, based on preparatory work done during the confidence building phase.
- The United States will monitor that the plan is carried out – no European Union observers will be involved.

NEW RECRUITS AT TEL HASHOMER: These two newly-conscripted soldiers from the haredi religious world are setting an example. [Israel Sun]

PA holding 32 Israelis

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian Authority is holding 32 Israeli Arabs in custody for co-operating with Israel, according to a Justice Ministry report.

The Israeli citizens were arrested after entering Palestinian territory for business or to visit family members and friends. They are currently being interrogated in various detention centres in the territories and in some cases have been tortured, the report says.

The Justice Ministry learned of the detainees after their families applied to the ministry for aid. All Israeli appeals to the PA asking for the release of Israeli citizens under arrest in the Palestinian territories have been rejected. Some of the detainees have been held since April of last year.

Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein, who has submitted several appeals for the release of the detainees, said yesterday that the arrest of the citizens is contrary to the agreements signed between Israel and the PA in Oslo as well as basic human rights.

Palestinian leader is making fools of everyone

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'Aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

There is no better example of the cynical attitude of the Palestinian Authority (PA), and of PA Chairman Arafat himself, to acts of terror, and of their disdain for keeping agreements, than their handling of the slaughter carried out by a suicide bomber at the discotheque in the Tel Aviv Dolphinarium that has now claimed 21 young lives.

Analysis

The Shin Bet (General Security Services) quickly found out who was involved in the bombing. At a meeting of the Supreme Security Committee, Israel presented the Palestinian delegates with the names of two Hamas men who had sent the bomber: one from Nablus and one from Qalqiliyah. The Palestinians were asked to arrest the two immediately – and the Americans supported this demand.

What actually happened? The two men responsible for the attack were invited to a meeting at the offices of one of the Palestinian security services. In a conversation – not an interrogation – with the PA security agents, the two admitted their involvement in sending the suicide bomber to Tel Aviv and preparing him for the attack.

And here comes the interesting part: the two were warned by the Palestinian security people not to carry out similar activities in the future – and apparently they have even signed an agreement to that effect! After that chat, they were released to their homes. At a second meeting of the Supreme Security Committee, the Palestinians were asked what they had done with the two men. Their answer was: "They have been warned!"

Whoever gave instructions to treat the two perpetrators of terror in this manner becomes a full partner to the slaughter and is responsible for encouraging additional murderous acts. It further shows that Israel has an absolute right to defend itself, and to stop acts of terror (an activity which, for some reason, has been defined as "elimination").

This story is a typical example of how the PA works today. Israel also presented a list of about 35 people who are planning terrorist acts, including eight or 10 who intend to carry out suicide attacks.

Yasser Arafat

Arafat is making fools of Israel and of the Americans. All this would not be happening without Arafat's approval. By his method of administration and domination, he makes sure to sow confusion even among his delegates in the Supreme Security Committee. Because each of these senior delegates is separately responsible to him directly, he prevents true co-ordination even among his own representatives. It is not only his political echelon that wonders what Arafat really wants; but it is also the heads of his security services.

Only someone suffering from amnesia can ignore similar behaviour on his part in the past – his dozens of violations of agreements with Arab countries, and of ceasefire agreements in Lebanon and in Jordan. One could write a fascinating doctoral thesis about it. The debate that has raged in Israel concerning the extent to which Arafat controls what happens in the territories is absurd. It is also harmful to Israel.

While it's true that there are some "black holes" in Arafat's control – like the popular opposition committees in Rafiah, there is no longer any doubt among all Israel's intelligence arms that Arafat bears full responsibility for what goes on, for good or for ill.

Arafat must not be allowed to make a fool of Israel in the matter of the ceasefire. We must not make any allowances for him when it comes to preserving the ceasefire agreement. That is the big mistake which many, including Israel and the Americans, have made in the past. If we do not now insist on the complete observance and honouring of the ceasefire agreements, we will not succeed in doing so at any time in the future – as long as Arafat leads the Palestinians.

A system that allows one to kill Israelis, while at the same time conduct negotiations – this technique was embarrassingly demonstrated when the delegations met in Taba (during peace negotiations in January, shortly before the elections for prime minister) – is unacceptable. We should not conduct political negotiations with Arafat, or accept his proposal to hold international congresses and meetings with him, so long as the acts of killing continue and the ceasefire agreement is being violated, both openly and covertly.

Fatah man killed in phone blast, Israel denies responsibility

By Amos Harel
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A PLO Fatah activist wanted by Israeli forces was killed last Sunday when a public phone he was using in the West Bank city of Nablus exploded. Israel denied Palestinian Authority accusations of responsibility for the explosion, dismissing it as a "work accident."

Fatah leaders refuted the denial and said the assassination ends the cease-fire. Osama Jawabreh, 29, died in the explosion in the centre of Nablus, where he lived. Two children who were near the phone booth, a brother and sister aged 2 and 4, were wounded by shrapnel and have been hospitalized.

The circumstances of this explosion are almost identical to the explosion in April that killed Iyad Hardan, who was chief of the Islamic Jihad's military faction in the West Bank. Hardan was also killed when a bomb went off in a public phone booth. The incident is considered an assassination although Israel has not admitted to it.

Several other explosives specialists working in Palestinian organizations have also been killed during the last year. According to PA figures, some 30 key activists were killed since the start of the intifadah last September.

Top Israeli officials, however, told Ha'aretz that in this case, the PA accusations are simply not true.

"We did not kill Jawabreh," said one source, "although we are not sorry for his death." The official said he was killed by one of his own explosives.

Hussein Sheikh, a Fatah official in the West Bank, ignored the denial and said the assassination ended the cease-fire.

"With this murder, Sharon has opened the gates of hell for the Israelis," said Marwan Barghouti, another prominent member of the Fatah.

Shin Bet officials say Jawabreh was one of the top professionals in preparing explosives in the West Bank. He is believed to have prepared bombs that went off in Netanya, Kfar Sava, Petah Tikva and Hod Hasharon.

The Shin Bet also believes Jawabreh had been working on plans to send a rigged car into Israel sometime in the near future. Jawabreh also co-operated with activists of other organizations such as the Popular Front and Hamas.

There have been several mysterious explosions in Nablus over the past few weeks. At least some of these were undoubtably work accidents.

Remembrances of Tunisia 34 years ago

By CLAUDE COHEN-MATLOFSKY
Special to The CJN

I still remember the smell of burning meat, the sight of blood running in the gutters, the very face of hatred. It has marked me to this day.

It was a very hot day in June 1967. I was 8½, a Grade 3 student. I remember my parents discussing whether or not they should send me to school. We lived in Tunis. In all elementary schools, students attended alternatively one week in the morning, one week in the afternoon. My sister Joelle, one year younger than I, went to school that morning. My parents finally decided to send me that afternoon.

I remember departing for school, in the car of my Italian neighbour friend's father, a little Renault Dauphine. Unexpectedly, before the end of the day, my mother appeared in the classroom, accompanied by an Arab worker from her office. My mother was the legal secretary of maitre Bellaga, a cousin of the president's wife, Wassila Bourghiba, who was also a deputy at the National Assembly. She explained to me that she came to pick me up earlier because there was a riot and that all the Jews were in danger.

They took me out of the class and we drove to our apartment on a commercial street. The driver had to stop the car at the street's other end. We walked down with him. I saw the blood on the ground. I asked my mother whether they had killed the Jews. She reassured me. This was only from the meat of the kosher butcher shops that they had destroyed.

Then I saw a ladder leaning on our balcony, on the second floor of our building. The shutters were closed tightly. My grandmother told us that the Arabs tried to climb to our apartment to harm her, my grandfather, Joelle, and my other sister, Sophie, who was not even a year old. We managed to get inside with the help of our superintendent, whom we heard saying, "There are no Jews in this building, only Indians." We actually had many neighbours of Maltese origin.

In the apartment, we found everyone okay. But my grandparents were frightened. My mother's Arab worker drove us all back to maitre Bellaga's office. We were offered refuge at my mother's boss's house, in the outskirts of the city. Maitre Bellaga himself drove us to his mansion. My father, who was a high school math teacher at La Marsa, a town outside Tunis, came back from work early as well. He drove directly to maitre Bellaga's mansion, as he was advised. Maitre Gellaga, his wife, son and daughter welcomed us very warmly.

We spent two days there until the situation in the capital returned to calm in the capital. Then we went back to our apartment. I remember watching on television the president's speech. He reassured the Jews, explaining that the riot's instigators came from Algeria, that Tunisian Arabs have always been pacifists, that it would not happen again.

But we had lost trust in Tunisia. My father's side of the family was already established in France since the early '50s, so we had decided to move as soon as possible.

We moved to Paris that same summer. My father left first, then my sisters, and then my mother and I followed the next month. The arrival in France was rather difficult. We were all spread out amongst our relatives since no one could accommodate us all together. My parents stayed at one of my uncle's with Sophie, while Joelle and I stayed at one of my aunt's. We saw my parents on weekends until they found jobs and an apartment in Goussainville, a suburb of Paris. Then my grandparents were able to join us from Tunis. After them, all of my maternal relatives followed.

All my family has left Tunisia. I've never gone back. Relatives of mine who have returned from visits there have said that some Arabs asked them, "Why did the Jews leave?"

They had forgotten the events of June 1967.

Aliyah continues despite intifadah

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM – Some 35,000 Jews have immigrated to Israel since the outbreak of the intifadah, while 5,000 have visited the country as a mark of solidarity and 20,000 Jewish youths have come to Israel for short- and long-term studies.

The figures were presented last week before the Zionist General Council (the highest institution of the World Zionist Organization, which convenes once a year).

Salai Meridor, chairman of the organization, said its main goals include keeping a steady rate of 50,000 new immigrants per year.

LEGAL NOTICE BY ORDER OF THE COURT
SUMMARY NOTICE OF PENDENCY OF CLASS ACTION, PROPOSED SETTLEMENT AND SETTLEMENT HEARING

TO VICTIMS OF ANTI-SEMITIC PERSECUTION IN FRANCE AND THEIR HEIRS WHO MAY HAVE CLAIMS AGAINST BARCLAYS BANK OR J.P. MORGAN & CO. RELATING TO BANKING ACTIVITIES IN FRANCE DURING AND AFTER WWII

Barclays Bank and J.P. Morgan & Co. have agreed to pay $3,612,500 and $2,750,000, respectively, in U.S. dollars to settle legal claims relating to World War II era conduct of their and their predecessors' operations in France.

The United States District Court for the Eastern District of NY (the "Court") will hold a hearing October 1, 2001, to decide whether to approve the Settlements.

Note that you may be included if you strongly believe that you or a relative own assets held by one of these banks, even if you have no account documents.

NOTE: If you are unsure what bank held your assets, you should NOT APPLY HERE, but to the separate and different French Banks Settlement, which will pay claims against all other banks in France during WWII, even if unknown. Information is available at:

www.civs.gouv.fr
www.wiesenthal.com

WHO IS INCLUDED IN THE SETTLEMENTS

You may be a Settlement Class Member if you can show or strongly believe that you or a relative are both (a) of Jewish lineage AND (b) owned assets that were held in France during World War II by:

(i) Barclays Bank (France) Ltd., Credit Algerien, Bank Heine et Cie, Societe Parisienne de Banque, Rothschild Frères, the stockbroker Guy de Riempré or certain branches of Lloyds Bank [then you may be in the Barclays Class]; or

(ii) Morgan et Cie or Guaranty Trust Co. of New York [then you may be in the J.P. Morgan Class].

HOW TO PARTICIPATE

If you can show or strongly believe you are a Barclays or J.P. Morgan Settlement Class Member, you are urged to send in the attached request for the Mailed Notice, Proof of Claim, and further information on how to participate.

If you would rather not wait to be mailed this information, you may obtain it immediately on the Internet at the following websites:

www.barclaysfrenchclaims.org
www.jpmorganfrenchclaims.org

Even if you cannot prove that you or a relative had such assets, non-public records that will be reviewed in the Claims Procedure may establish that you are a Settlement Class Member.

A Plan of Allocation, described in the Notice, has been proposed that would award the full present value, if possible, of all assets blocked and never returned.

If the Court gives final approval of the Settlement, a Plan of Allocation will be adopted and the Funds will be paid. Not all applicants are eligible for payments.

IF YOU CHOOSE NOT TO PARTICIPATE

If you can show or strongly believe you are a Barclays or J.P. Morgan Settlement Class Member, but do not wish to participate in or be bound by the Settlements, you must exclude yourself by sending a letter to the Settlement Fund Administrator by September 17, 2001. If you do not, you will be barred from bringing any legal action against either bank relating to the settled disputes. If you exclude yourself, you will NOT be able to claim a portion of the Funds.

HOW TO COMMENT OR OBJECT

You may comment on the terms of the Settlement by September 17, 2001. The Mailed Notice describes how to submit comments or objections. You have the right to appear at the October 1, 2001 hearing in person or through counsel, although you do not have to.

WHO REPRESENTS YOU

The Court appointed attorneys as Settlement Class Counsel. You do not have to pay the Court appointed attorneys. The Court will authorize payment of attorneys' costs and fees from a separate fund.

According to Reports

Confusion from media's blurred distinctions

The BBC's documentary, The Accused, which aired on June 17, focused on Ariel Sharon's involvement in the Sabra and Shatilla massacre of 1982 and created a wave of protest in Israel over its unfairness.

The BBC claims the program was an investigative report, although it uncovered nothing previously unknown about the event. Fergal Keane, the feature's principal reporter, has insisted that he had "absolutely no political motivation": "We made the program because there are fundamental questions which had to be asked and need to be answered… That is what our role is as journalists in this process. We are simply [!] investigating and asking people to account for themselves."

Apparently, however, there was a political agenda: to prove, at an especially delicate period in Israeli-Palestinian relations (in which the BBC has played a decidedly biased role in favour of the Palestinians), that Israel's newly elected prime minister should be indicted as a war criminal.

It will be recalled that in February 1983, Israel's Kahan Commission determined that Sharon was not responsible for the killings carried out by the Lebanese Phalange. However, the Commission did find Sharon "indirectly responsible" for failing to anticipate what the Phalange might do once they were allowed to enter the Palestinian refugee camps, especially since their leader, Bashir Gameyal, had been assassinated the day before.

While Keane insists that his film is "very, very clear" that it is not accusing Sharon of direct responsibility for the massacre, his documentary blurs this very point. He speaks of Sharon as having given "the order," thereby leaving the impression that Sharon ordered the killings.

This point is fudged at a critical stage in the program in which the indictment against Sharon is handed down. Keane: "Isn't it reasonable to say that if responsibility goes all the way to the top, to the person who gave the orders, that potentially makes Sharon a war criminal?" The term "the orders" is left dangling, but Richard Goldstone, the chief prosecutor of the UN War Crimes Tribunal from 1994-96, answers that the person who "gave the commands"… is "more responsible even than the people who carry out the order," thereby reinforcing the implication of intent.

As well, Keane failed to mention Sharon's libel suit against Time Magazine, in which a U.S. jury in 1985 ruled that Time had defamed Sharon by falsely accusing him of having incited the Phalange to carry out the massacre. (The jury exonerated Time of malice, however.) Following the program, Keane rationalized the omission by again claiming that unlike Time, the BBC is not charging Sharon with deliberate intent and that indirect responsibility is sufficient for an indictment.

The conflating and blurring of distinctions is a shoddy but effective tactic. By the time international law professor Richard Falk remarks that Sharon "gave the directions and orders that resulted in the Phalange entering the camps," the confused viewer cannot be faulted for assuming that Sharon either had knowledge about, or indeed, had ordered the attack.

Shiva Asar b'Tammuz is Sunday, July 8

On the 17th of Tammuz, we remember the attacks on our faith, our land and our people

This year, remembering just isn't enough

Our faith, our land, and our people have been besieged with attacks no less frightening than those we recall on the 17th of Tammuz.

What can we do?

On this fast day – Sunday, July 8 – let us come together in our thousands to demonstrate our solidarity with Israel and her people.

A program of prayer and action will take place in Orthodox synagogues all across North America.

- Recital of Tehillim
- Specially produced video, now being taped in Israel
- Signing of a resolution to be handed to elected officials
- Positive steps you can take to support the people of Israel who desperately want to know that you are with them
- Arranging solidarity trips to Israel from your community

You and your family are urged to participate in this meaningful united response. This year, let's not use Shiva Asar b'Tammuz only for recalling our history. Let's use it to try and change our future!

Call your local Orthodox synagogue for the time of the program. For more information, please call 212.613.8226 or visit www.ou.org

VISIT ISRAEL NOW!

It's by far the most effective response you can offer.

Nothing you can do for Israel right now will mean more than traveling there and showing Israelis that you care. With one voice, the leaders and the people of Israel are telling us: "Come, spend time here, fill our hotels, daven in our shuls, stroll through our neighborhoods, visit with friends and family."

Join the OU/RCA week-long Solidarity Trip for shul groups and individuals leaving Sunday, August 12th. Full details and sign-up forms will be available at the July 8th program, or by calling 212.613.8188 or at www.ou.org.

More scheduled trips will follow, or you can call the Orthodox Union to coordinate customized trips for your shul.

Going on your own? We can help you. Call the Travel Desk at the OU Abrams Jerusalem World Center (011.972.2.566.7787, ext. 249, or e-mail: trochel@netvision.net.il) for information about hotels, guides and customized tours.

This year in Jerusalem.

Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The multi-award-winning, Toronto-based author of The Secret of Gabi's Dresser has just launched her second historical fiction for Second Story Press' Holocaust Remembrance Series for Young Readers.

"Clara's War takes place during the Second World War in Terezin, also known as Theresienstadt, the ghetto/concentration camp that was set up as a transport station in what is now the Czech Republic," says author Kathy Kacer, 47, a former psychologist.

"Jews were sent there for relatively short periods of time before being sent on to mostly Auschwitz," Kacer says.

"What is remarkable about Terezin was that it was a concentration camp of contrasts. On one hand, there was the worst possible conditions – death, starvation, disease and filth, and on the other hand Terezin had incredible cultural and arts events."

Inmates performed operas, concerts and lectures, including the children's opera Brundibar by Czech composer Hans Krasa, also an inmate at Terezin. The children of Terezin performed Brundibar over 50 times; when a child from the cast was deported to Auschwitz, another child would simply fill in the missing place.

In Clara's War, published this past April, a fictional family – Clara, her younger brother Peter and her parents – is deported to Terezin.

"There, Clara encounters all of the contrasts, the worst possible

Remounted Cows to be milked for TV special

By BEN ROSE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO—The story of how Allan Merovitz's grandfather, Velvel Waxman, born in Ozeroff, a shtetl in south-east Poland, came to be the only Jew in Canso, N.S., will be made into a TV special which will air on the Public Broadcasting System (PBS).

If Cows Could Fly, a musical about Merovitz's family's experiences, was purchased by PBS because it wanted "Jewish programming that was enteraining and different," said producer Don Booth.

The musical is being remounted for a four-week run until July 14 at Artword Theatre (75 Portland St.) and will also be presented outdoors in Winnipeg as the centrepiece of a Jewish festival occurring, of all places, in a Jesuit church courtyard, Aug. 3 and 4, at St. Norbert Centre for the Arts.

The PBS special will be shot there next summer. The station has also agreed to distribute the film.

"My co-producer, Terry Coles, has a friend at St. Norbert Centre who was looking for a piece with the kind of swing and humour that Cows offers," said Booth.

Allan Merovitz

"It is unusual for a show with such a strong Jewish basis to be in that setting."

Merovitz said he came across a book on Ozeroff, written by a French Jew who survived the Shoah, by chance. It is subtitled The Little Jewish Town That Was.

"It has a wonderful quote in it, that a wedding in Ozeroff was no wedding unless there was a Waxman singing at it."

The Dora-award winning performer said he believed his grandfather, named Willie by an immigration officer in 1905, was one of the singers.

Born in Montreal, Merovitz was raised in Smiths Falls where "Zadie" Waxman, who made his living as a shoemaker, moved the whole family. That explains why If Cows Could Fly has Ottawa Valley fiddle tunes and country and western songs, interspersed with Yiddish melodies.

Merovitz's mother, Edith, still lives in Montreal.

He is passionate about the need for young Jewish people to know the history of their forbearers, of the struggle between the Old and New World, and the hardships that Jewish immigrants underwent in small towns and villages across Canada.

He tells of his "bubba" who somehow managed to feed his whole family and strangers in depression-ridden Montreal and of how his grandfather came to Canada to avoid being conscripted by the Cossacks.

Merovitz spent 10 years researching his family and interviewing elder members who have since died. He thinks the current production, which he has re-written to focus on his relationship with his father, the late Reuben Merovitz, and his grandfather, is better than the one shown at Artword in February last year.

"We've taken a wonderful show and made it more magical."

In all, he plays 20 different characters, and does all the singing, aided by musicians Ron Weihs, who directs If Cows Could Fly, and Jarl Anderson.

For information on show times and prices call Artword Theatre, 416-408-2783.

impact of being in the midst of the war and some of the most beautiful parts," Kacer says. "She meets one of her best friends from home, Hanna and a young boy, whose name is Jacob. The story really focuses on these three children and Clara's brother. Clara auditions for and gets a part in Brundibar, Peter, who is much frailer than Clara, gets sick and Jacob participates in a dangerous escape."

Kacer's first book, The Secrets of Gabi's Dresser, which won the Silver Birch Award, Jewish book Award, the Hackmatack Children's Choice Book Award and numerous other prizes, was based on her mother and grandmother's Holocaust experiences.

Kacer first heard about Brundibar six years ago when her daughter, singer Gabi, 16, performed in the first English production produced in Toronto by Helena Fine.

"Brundibar is a sweet little opera, but when I learned the context of how and when it was first performed and by whom, it absolutely enthralled me," she says.

"I couldn't believe this children's opera could have been performed under those circumstances and here it is 60 years later and still being heard. I thought for many years how I was going to write this as a book.

"During my daughter's participation, I met John Freund, a survivor of Terezin and Auschwitz. John had not performed in Brundibar, but had seen in several times and knew many of the young people in it. He helped me fill in the historical pieces. Through my discussions with John and my own fascination with Holocaust history and bringing it to young people, I started to put the book together."

Kacer initially wrote her first book to tell her children – she also has a son, Jake, 14 – about their grandparents, who died relatively young. She felt their story couldn't be told without including the Holocaust because it was such an integral part of her parents' lives.

"When I first started to write, it was for my own children, but obviously I think these stories need to be told to a wider audience, particularly since that generation of survivors is aging and dying. As a second generation survivor, I have some responsibility to keep the stories alive.

"Gabi's Dresser was described as a gentle telling of the Holocaust, which was very appealing to parents, educators and kids themselves," she says.

"When I started to write Clara's War, I had a younger audience in mind, but because it was set in a concentration camp, the details were more harsh and blatant, it needed to be written for a slightly older audience, aged 10 and up."

Kacer wants children reading her books to be left with a sense of hope – to know what happened, but to feel that the future can be different for them. Nazi Germany created a hateful system, she says, and if we understand what hatefulness can do, we have the choice not to take that path and to create better systems for the future.

The author is currently working on her third book and touring the country speaking to children about the Holocaust.

"If kids begin to question what went on in Europe at that time, doesn't that open up the best opportunities to see the world differently or be part of a different world?"

An artistic nod to the jazz festival

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Colours of Jazz, a wondrous celebration of jazz through paintings by some of Toronto's finest artists, is at the Robert Mede Gallery until July 14.

Featured in this group exhibition are Telford Fenton, Michael Fisher, Juan Luis Gallagos, David Gnass, Myra Lowenthal, Marilyn McKay, Berge Missakian and Paul Peregal.

Depicting jazz performers in a spectacular array of colour and form, the artists, who range in age from 22 to 80, bare their personal perceptions, reaching inside for a unique vision just as the musicians strive for their singular sound.

Bop City, by David Gnass, a montage of late '40s bebop musicians, virtually explodes from the canvas with youthful energy.

In contrast, Juan Luis Gallagos' abstract, Hombre, though it is composed of hot colours, appears quite controlled.

Paul Peregal's Round Midnight

Telford Fenton's New York Subway, loose, subdued expressionism, reveals a shadowy figure carrying his music case up a stairway from the underground and there is a feeling of the city of subways, always on the move.

Lady Sings the Blues, is Marilyn McKay's concept of Billie Holliday, who could walk onto any stage and instantly touch the sensibilities of her audience.

In his silkscreen, Jazz Up in Cordoba, Berge Missakian brings exceptional technical ability and clarity to a somewhat restrained composition.

Michael Fisher's King Oliver, portrays traditional '20s and '30s jazz in the style of the American social realists. Here, a band of street musicians with the great King Oliver, struts and sings and plays with joyful abandon.

Myra Lowenthal integrates an impressionistic quality into her reflective Soprano Sax. A single musician stands, head bowed, at one with his music.

Paul Peregal's Round Midnight, expressionistic, vibrant blues and browns, strong strokes, an aura of motion, springs from his obsession with jazz.

A musician friend observes, "You don't paint jazz musicians, you paint jazz."

The Robert Mede Gallery is at 321 Davenport Rd., two blocks west of Avenue Road. Telephone 416-966-9362. Gallery hours, Monday to Wednesday by appointment, Thursday to Saturday, 10 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Rivers & Rickles: She's billed as "the queen of the barbed one-liner" and he's called "the king of the zinger." Celebrated show-business personalities Joan Rivers and Don Rickles come together for a single performance in Toronto. $40 - $85. Hummingbird Centre, Monday July 9, 8 p.m. 416-872-2262.

* * *

Pet Caper: Los Angeles-based film director Lawrence Guterman, formerly of Montreal and Toronto, is the director of Cats & Dogs, a live-action spy-genre spoof in which domesticated canines and felines battle it out for world domination. The Warner Brothers production, which stars Jeff Goldblum, Elizabeth Perkins, 11-year-old Vancouver actor Scott Brody and scores of memorable pets, opens in theatres July 4.

Guterman, who made his first short film while in the eighth grade, earned a physics degree at Harvard before deciding to go into film. He taught an undergraduate course in physics at the University of Southern California to pay for his film studies there, and also studied film animation at Sheridan College in Toronto. Among other cinematic achievements, he directed several sequences in Woody Allen's animated film Antz.

* * *

Jazz at Mezzetta: Katztoller, a band consisting of jazz guitarist-pianist Brian Katz and saxophonist-flautist Ernie Tollar, is joined by bassist Artie Roth to play Katzian and other compositions in the "world jazz" mode.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

The music is rooted in the modern jazz tradition and embraces elements of Jewish, East Indian, classic-romantic and various folk traditions.

Mezzetta Cafe, 681 St. Clair Ave. W. June 28, 9:15 p.m. & July 1, 8:30 p.m. 416 658-5687.

* * *

Canada Day in Downsview: Tom Cochrane, Kim Mitchell and Jacksoul are the headliners at Downsview Park's Canada Day Celebration, Sunday, July 1. The day of free concerts goes from 11 a.m. to 11 p.m. Molson Canadian's Big Birthday begins at 7 p.m. and culminates in an elaborate fireworks display choreographed to music.

The talent line-up includes Beyond the Pale, featuring Eric Stein, Anne Lindsay, Sasha Luminsky, Martin Van de Ven and Bret Higgins, performing from 3 to 3:45 p.m.

Shaloa – Jewish happenings on the Hawaiian islands

By RACHEL AND BEN SCHLESINGER
Special to The CJN

HONOLULU, Hawaii — Shaloa (Shalom-Aloha) from Hawaii.

The University of Hawaii, is situated on 300 acres of landscaped gardens, where 560 varieties of trees and plants grow.

We stayed at Lincoln Hall, the visitors' residence of the well-known East-West Centre, an international educational centre.

The "Aloha" state has a population of just over a million people. Tourism is its number one industry.

There are well-known islands like Kauai, Maui, Molokai and Hawaii. Honolulu, the state capital is located on the island of Oahu.

Oahu, which means gathering place, has nearly 80 percent of the population and hosts at least a million visitors every year. Pearl Harbour and military bases of all the branches of the American military are located there as well.

We arrived just before Purim and celebrated this joyous holiday with a handful of Jews living on the island.

We were eager to renew our long-time friendship with Rabbi Morris Goldfarb who had retired to Oahu to be near his daughter, Deborah Washofsky, and family.

Rabbi Goldfarb is still active giving adult education classes, training bar and bat mitzvah youngsters and performing outdoor weddings.

We had just missed a testimonial dinner in honour of his 85th birthday. Over 200 people attended, and the synagogue, Temple Emanu-El (2550 Pali Highway, ph. 808-595-7921, fax 808-595-6306) raised over $50,000 for the Goldfarb Fund.

The Temple is beautiful. It is surrounded by a tropical setting. The Rabbi is Avi Magid, and the executive director is Michelle Robinson.

Every Friday night there is a Reform service, and on Shabbat mornings you can find a traditional service.

On Saturday morning at 9 a.m. you can join a Torah study group in the library. There is a Jewish afternoon school attached to the Temple.

The sisterhood is active and sponsors theatre evenings, musical guest artists, a tallit making class and the Runsq Judaica shop.

If you visit the shop be sure to buy some kippot (skullcaps), handmade with Hawaiian flower cloth.

You can also find the Bernard Levinson Jewish Archives of Hawaii which contains a lot of data about Jews and Jewish organizations, such as Hadassah.

If you plan to visit Hawaii, you can find information on the internet at www.shaloha.com.

Rachel Schlesinger is an Associate Professor at York University. Ben Schlesinger is a Professor Emeritus at University of Toronto.

Seniors Scene

Friday's the day for Yiddish club members

By BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

TORONTO — The average age of the members of the Yiddish Culture and Discussion Club is 80, and some have to use magnifying glasses or walkers.

But every Friday morning, 25 to 50 members gather at the Bernard Betel Centre and bring their own stories to read or songs to sing. They discuss Yiddish writers and other famous personalities, as well as current events in Israel.

Many lost everyone they knew in the Holocaust. Most were born in Europe and came to Canada after World War II. They include 103-year-old William Katz, brother of the late Ben Katz, the philanthropist, who with his wife, Hilda, built Baycrest's new Home for the Aged; prominent Yiddish writer Simcha Simchovitch; former Judge Philip Bend, 90; and a few former high school teachers in both the Jewish day schools and the public education system.

When it held its annual memorial for Yom Hashoah recently, Brucha Goren was one of the six who lit candles. The others were Max Roston, Martin Boimol, Simchovitch, Michael Waszezyna, and Berl Leifkovitz.

After the candles were lit, everyone said Kaddish in unison. The chair, instructor Joseph Pink, chanted K'El Maleh Rachamim, and sang songs by Mordechai Gebirtig who was shot by the Germans in 1942.

Pink, 83, who spent 26 years in Israel before coming to Canada 18 years ago, was accompanied on keyboard by another member, Leon Zelicki, who sang Yiddish songs.

Pink read from books about the Warsaw Ghetto, one of which was written by Emanuel Ringelblum, a Holocaust survivor and historian who kept a detailed account of what happened in the ghetto.

The members listened in silence as Pink read about the bravery of Mordechai Anielewicz who led the ghetto uprising. All his comrades were gassed in the the end.

The ghetto was created in November 1940, and according to Ringelblum, 700,000 Jews were crowded into it. In the first 20 months, 100,000 Jews died from typhus, but in 1942 the Germans decided that not enough Jews had died even though bodies were lying in the streets.

"The Germans told the Jews that they were being sent to a place where they could earn a living and wait out the war," said Pink. "Instead, they were sent to Treblinka."

A member spoke up on behalf of the 14,000 Bulgarian Jews who died. The woman gave an emotional description of the anti-Semitism in Ukraine, and recalled being told that "when the Germans come you will hang from a tree."

Years ago, basketball's flash players were Jewish

By JON ENTINE
Special to The CJN

LOS ANGELES — The red-hot Philly basketball team had a pint-sized, but flashy star shooter, and an old school coach who was more teacher than tough disciplinarian. References to the biblical David abounded in the media.

Sounds like the Philadelphia 76ers, who surprised everyone with their heart and heady play throughout their playoff run, before succumbing to their own injuries and an acute Shaq attack.

Nope. It was the South Philadelphia Hebrew Association SPHAs (pronounced spas), a team that dominated the sport in the 1920s and '30s. The flashy shooter was set-shot expert Inky Lautman, and the savvy coach was Eddie Gottlieb, who was also the owner of one of the most successful teams in basketball history. And David was the star on the team's jerseys.

Today, the only thing Jewish about the current Sixers team is coach Larry Brown, who starred on the U.S. gold-medal team at the Maccabiah Games in Israel before launching his pro career. Brown was born in Brooklyn, that "other" Jewish basketball town. But there are plenty of parallels between the Hebrews, as the SPHAs were nicknamed, and today's Sixers.

Both were subject sometimes to egregious racial stereotyping. The bad boy, rap star of basketball, Allen Iverson has been recognized for his incredible athletic ability and lightning speed. He and LA's Kobe Bryant are praised for their "athleticism" and "natural talents," compliments, true, but perhaps unwitting devaluations of their hard-earned achievements.

Such stereotypes reflect a long tradition that goes back more than seven decades, when the game emerged from the ghettos of Philadelphia, New York and Baltimore. Sportswriters then used to rave about the gaudy skills of "natural athletes." Sounds familiar, except the stars had names like Dutch Garfinkel and Doc Lou Sugerman, and the top teams were the Philadelphia "Hebrews," as they were nicknamed, the New York Whirlwinds and the Cleveland Rosenblums.

"The reason, I suspect, that basketball appeals to the Hebrew with his Oriental background," wrote Paul Gallico, sports editor of the New York Daily News in the 1930s, "is that the game places a premium on an alert, scheming mind, flashy trickiness, artful dodging and general smart aleckness."

At the turn of the century, European Jews flooded off immigrant ships into the ghettos of the booming Eastern metropolises. New York and Philadelphia were the epicenters of the basketball world, with the dominant team, the Hebrews, ensconced in South Philly.

"Basketball is a city game," noted Sonny Hill, an executive adviser with the Sixers who has run a high-school summer league for more than 35 years. "If you trace basketball back to the 1920s, '30s, and '40s, that's when the Jewish people were very dominant in the inner city. And they dominated basketball."

Although New York turned out more Jewish stars in pure numbers, the SPHAs were basketball's best known and most successful all-Jewish team. From 1918 onward, the Hebrews barnstormed across the East and Midwest, playing in a variety of semi-pro leagues that were precursors to the NBA. In an incredible 22-season stretch, they played in 18 championship series, losing only five.

"Every Jewish boy was playing basketball," Harry Litwack said a few years ago, before he died in 1999. Litwack starred for the SPHAs in the 1930s. "Every phone pole had a peach basket on it. And every one of those Jewish kids dreamed of playing for the SPHAs."

"It was a way out of the ghetto," said Dave Dabrow, a guard with the original Hebrews. Dabrow, who eventually took a job coaching, died in 1996. "The young Jewish boy would never have been able to go to college if it wasn't for the amount of basketball playing and for the scholarships."

The first intercollegiate game in the East, a 6-4 shellacking of Temple by Haverford College, took place in March 1894. Basketball had a notorious reputation back then. The rules provided for few fouls, making the game a barely controlled melee.

It was common practice to drive an opponent into the steel mesh fence that surrounded the court, and pile-ups were as frequent as at hockey games today. Players paraded on and off the court with bandaged legs and bleeding heads. This offended the Victorian sensibilities of the Protestant ruling class in many cities, leading to a temporary ban on the game at local YMCAs, which were fearful their Christian boys would be corrupted.

Not so the Jewish, Irish, Polish and Italian communities, filled with the sons of immigrants. Basketball bridged the highly segregated Jewish and Gentile communities. In Philadelphia, the two best high school squads, Southern and Central, were stocked with first-generation Jews. Gottlieb and future SPHAs Harry "Chicky" Passon, Edwin "Hughie" Black, Mockie Bunnin, and Charlie Newman led Southern to city titles in 1914, 1915 and 1916. These Jews introduced a different style of play.

"It was a quick-passing, running game, as opposed to the bullying and fighting way which was popular other places," explained Litwack.

The best high-school graduates went on to play for one of the church teams, until anti-Semitism heated up. In 1918, Gottlieb and some of his former high school buddies convinced the YMHA to buy them uniforms, which featured Hebrew letters spelling SHPAs, along with the Magen David as team symbols.

By the early 1920s, the SPHAs ventured out into the world of travelling semi-pro ball. With the emergence of National Socialism in Germany and an escalation of anti-Semitism in the United States., Jewish players faced incessant racial slurs, bottles thrown at them during games and biased officials in the small towns in which they played.

Meanwhile in New York, Tuesday night doubleheaders at the YMHA at Broad and Pine streets attracted crowds of 1,500 or more to watch Lautman, Passon, "Lady-killer" Kaselman and Gottlieb display their skills. At the height of their success, the SPHAs were one of the best teams in the country, sweeping their leagues games and challenging teams in other cities.

By this time, the game had spread westward to Chicago and to Cleveland, home of the tough Rosenblums, founded by a clothing store magnate.

However, with travel costly, the chief rivals were in New York: the Holman-coached Hakoahs, the Celtics, a powerful Jewish-Irish team, the Knights of St. Anthony's, which represented a mixed Italian and Jewish Brooklyn neighborhood, and the New York Renaissance, the premier black team.

The encounters between the Jews and blacks were legendary. The Rens were flashy by the standards of the 1920s. Thousands of fans of both teams jammed the temporary seats set up in the marvelous ballroom at Philadelphia's Broadwood Hotel, where tickets went for a lofty 65 cents (35 cents for women).

By the late 1940s, dominion over the urban basketball courts had begun to pass to the fastest-growing group of urban dwellers, blacks who were migrating north from dying Southern farms in search of opportunity. The new generation of Jews began moving on to other pursuits – not to mention out to the suburbs. The depleted SPHAs eventually morphed into the Philadelphia Warriors, owned by Eddie Gottlieb, now nicknamed "The Mogul," who coached the first champions of what became the NBA.

The remnants of the Philadelphia basketball tradition rest on the shoulders of coach Brown and Allen Iverson, the cerebral coach and hip-hop warrior. Cast as David in these playoffs, these resilient Sixers are looking to next season to take their revenge on Goliath.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I am worried about my best friend. She is convinced that she is overweight when it is obvious that she is quite thin. She constantly compares herself to the stick-thin models in magazines, and she only wears baggy clothes claiming she is too fat to wear anything else. At school she stays in the library during lunch so she does not have to eat. Whenever I ask her if anything is wrong she gets mad at me for interfering in her life. I miss her and I want to help her but I don't know how. What should I do?

Helpless

Dear Helpless,

Your friend has the symptoms of the eating disorder anorexia nervosa. While it's common for teenage girls to see themselves as overweight, when they take it to the extremes of skipping meals and hiding their bodies it becomes dangerous.

Your friend may say she does not want your help, but it's important for you not to give up on her. She is going through a very tough period in her life and she needs all the support she can get. Make sure you have lots of patience with her because while she may be hard to get along with, inside, she'll appreciate your effort.

Encourage her to get help. There are many help lines that she can call, or she may prefer to speak to a school guidance counsellor or teacher. It's important that she speaks to an adult.

If she refuses to get help on her own, it may be necessary for you to speak to her parents, a teacher or guidance counsellor you trust and with whom you feel comfortable. It might seem like that would be betraying her, but her parents are better able to help her then you are. They can get her the medical help she needs. Anorexia is a serious disease that, when not treated, can lead to death. Don't keep this a secret. Doing that will not make you a better friend.

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

Chief Russian rabbi visits

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Berel Lazar has met Vladimir Putin 25 times and he believes he now can account for the Russian president's "strong feelings for the Jewish community."

During one of their meetings, Putin described his early years in St. Petersburg, growing up in a communal home in which a number of families shared kitchen and bathroom facilities. The communal homes were typically awful places to live, with drunkenness common and neighbours' shouting matches creating a constant din.

Rabbi Berel Lazar

Putin found an oasis of calm in one of his neighbour's homes – the modest flat of a Jewish couple and their only child, a daughter. The girl was his babysitter and the couple were unusual in that they never argued in front of him. He ate their gefilte fish and he remembers that on Friday nights, the old man would open a well-worn book and study. "I practically grew up with this family," Putin told the rabbi.

Rabbi Lazar believes the experience left an indelible impression on the Russian president, and as far as he is concerned, it was "Divine providence, a miracle, that God thought to put these people together."

Rabbi Lazar, one of two chief rabbis of Russia and a member of the Chabad Lubavitch movement, told the story at a breakfast meeting at the Lipa Green Building last week. He was a guest of UJA Federation and the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, as well as the Jewish Russian Community Centre. Russia's other chief rabbi, Adolph Shayevich, would also be welcome, said Congress spokesperson Bernie Farber.

French Jews protest Assad

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — French Jews greeted Syrian President Bashar Assad with angry demonstrations last week when he arrived in Paris for his first state visit to France.

The demonstrations, held in Paris and in several other French cities, were to protest the anti-Jewish remarks made by Assad during Pope John Paul II's visit to Damascus in May. During that visit, Assad accused the "treacherous" Jews of killing Jesus, trying to kill the prophet Mohammed, destroying holy sites and engaging in various plots against both Christianity and Islam over the ages.

"We don't object to the fact that France wants to play a role in the Middle East and [therefore wants] to speak with everyone," Haim Musicant, executive director of the umbrella association of French Jewry, CRIF, told Ha'aretz. "The demonstrations are not against France, but against Assad's anti-Semitism.

A few weeks ago, French Jewish leaders met with President Jacques Chirac to ask him to postpone Assad's visit until the latter apologized for his remarks. Chirac rejected this request, saying the visit would enable France to have more influence over Assad.

Last week, Foreign Minister Hubert Vedrine promised community leaders that France would at

Merchant Changed

TORONTO — Two scenes in a Stratford, Ont., production of William Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice were changed after a Muslim group protested. The changes were made in response to the Canadian division of the Council on American-Islamic Relations, which said the production's portrayal of the Prince of Morocco, a minor character, was offensive to Muslims.

Israel

Hotels to Hurt

JERUSALEM — A decision by the organizers of the Maccabiah Games to house athletes along the coast and not in Jerusalem will result in a loss of $1 million for Jerusalem hotels, the chair of the Jerusalem Hotel Union said last week. A Maccabiah spokesperson said that due to the smaller than expected number of participants in the Games, organizers had decided to let the athletes choose where they wanted to stay. Athletes preferred to be close to sports facilities in Haifa and Caesarea.

Britain Urged

JERUSALEM — The Simon Wiesenthal Centre is urging Britain's newly appointed Home Secretary David Blunkett to adopt a policy of denaturalization and deportation of Nazi war criminals, similar to that implemented in Canada and the United States. Britain continues to afford a haven for some of the worst Nazi henchmen, said Efraim Zuroff, head of the Centre's Israel office.

Training in U.S.

JERUSALEM — The Israeli air force will start conducting training exercises in the United States beginning next year, according to Israeli media reports. Israeli planes will be stationed in the United States once the exercises begin, the reports said.

Expanded Knesset

JERUSALEM — An official with the Israel Democracy Institute has proposed that the Knesset be expanded from 120 to 180 members. Labour legislator Yossi Katz, chair of the Knesset's parliamentary committee, backed the proposal, saying Israel's parliament is one of the world's smallest in relation to its population.

A Bit Off Course

JERUSALEM — An Israeli paraglider received a warm welcome when winds blew him off course and deposited him in a Palestinian village near the West Bank city of Jenin. Local residents offered him coffee and cake before Palestinian officials arrived and transferred him to Israeli officials in the area, according to Army Radio.

New Czech Restitution Fund

PRAGUE — A new property restitution fund in the Czech Republic is offering fresh hope to thousands of Jews around the world who have been unable to claim compensation for the loss of property seized by the Nazis.

The Prague-based Endowment Fund for Victims of the Holocaust is now accepting applications from those seeking restitution from the $2.5-million fund.

Representatives of the Czech Federation of Jewish Communities, which is operating the fund, said they expect up to 3,000 applications before the Dec. 31 deadline.

The compensation payments were made possible by Czech legislators, who last year voted to provide the money for victims of property seizure as a humanitarian gesture.

Unlike claims made directly to the Czech state, whose own property restitution laws bar claims from non-Czech citizens, the fund will pay out money to people of all nationalities.

Tomas Kraus, executive director of the Czech Federation of Jewish Communities, said the fund is important for those whose previous bids to gain compensation failed.

World

Schindler Award

BERLIN — A German court has ordered a newspaper to pay some $11,000 to Oskar Schindler's widow for publishing documents that belonged to her husband. Emilie Schindler had demanded four times as much from the Stuttgarter Zeitung, saying she has the right to the documents found by a German couple in 1999, and given to the newspaper.

Extra Security

WARSAW — Polish officials says they will post extra police at banks to make sure that Nazi-era forced labourers who pick up compensation aren't robbed as they leave with their money. Payments are slated to begin this week to 10,000 Polish survivors of the Nazis' slave and forced labour program.

Call to Lawyers

BERLIN — The leader of Germany's Jewish community has called on lawyers to forgo part of their payment for handling Nazi-era slave labour cases. Paul Spiegel urged lawyers to relinquish part of the estimated $51 million due them, as a gesture of respect to one-time slaves.

Rabbi's Murder

ZURICH — About 500 people marched in Zurich last week to ask Swiss officials to find those responsible for the June 7 shooting death of a 71-year-old rabbi visiting from Israel. A rabbi recited Kaddish at the spot where Rabbi Abraham Greenbaum was murdered. Police have discounted robbery as a motive.

Birthright travellers return 'rejuvenated'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Before 22-year-old Jascha Jabes left for Israel on the recent Birthright Israel trip, his parents called him long distance in the middle of the night because they feared for his safety should he proceed with plans to participate in the program.

Jabes, on the other hand, had no such concerns, and the 10-day free trip proceeded without incident. The situation "kind of made it more adventurous," he told The CJN last week from his home in Ottawa, where he works for the government.

In light of ongoing terror attacks, including the suicide bombing of the beach-side disco in Tel Aviv three days before the departure of the most recent Birthright Israel trip on June 4, the itinerary for 3,000 Birthright participants, which included 570 Canadians, was revised to provide even tighter security than on previous trips.

Tel Aviv, where they were to spend the first day, was taken off the agenda entirely, and the itinerary was subject to daily scrutiny.

"I was very confident in the Birthright system," said madrich (leader) Isaac Osiel, 24, of Toronto. In February, when Osiel accompanied a previous contingent, participants could "roam around" Tel Aviv, he said.

On both of this year's trips, participants were not allowed to leave the group with relatives living in Israel, although the relatives were allowed to join the group to see participants.

Boaz Willinger, a 25-year-old from St. Catharines who will soon enter teachers' college, feels the itinerary was actually changed for the better, offering "things you wouldn't get to do as an independent traveller," like hikes and digs in the northern part of Israel.

Students face tighter security

The constraints "would have been annoying had we not had such full days," said Jabes. "The days were so packed... I came back rejuvenated."

With the exception of the Tel Aviv bombing, the violence is localized, said Jabes, explaining that this contributed to his comfort level.

There were 150 young people – 21 percent of registrants – who cancelled or did not show up for the Birthright trip, which took place shortly after the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, a Reform umbrella, decided to suspend all teen programs to Israel this summer.

Although some Birthright participants kept in close phone contact with family members at home to reassure them of their safety, the main focus of conversation with their peers was "the joy the whole trip brought," said Jabes.

Bonnie Cohen, 26, an Ottawa dietitian, admitted to being "a little nervous, but I think we really felt... they would not take us if it were not safe." She didn't consider opting out, in part because her age means she will not be eligible to reapply next year.

"I felt incredibly comfortable," she said. "I felt like I was home."

Participants on her bus spent two days with young Israeli army officers who provided "incredible insight into Israeli life."

Although she understands why some North American parents don't want to send their children to Israel, "it hurts," she said. "We're just as Jewish as [Israelis] are. Why shouldn't you send your kids?"

Cohen, who has been asked to join the Birthright committee of Ottawa's Jewish Centre, said the trip "reaffirmed everything I believe in in Judaism and the culture."

Leah Spergel, a 20-year-old physical education student at Laurentian University in Sudbury, said that staying on kibbutzim meant that there was more interaction with Israelis, which she viewed as very positive.

Spergel, as well as other participants, noted how grateful Israelis were that they had travelled to Israel. "This was not from one single person. It was from numerous people."

Jabes did have one fear before he left: He was afraid that organizers might have a "brainwashing" agenda and that he might be exposed only to right-wing attitudes.

"That didn't happen," he said. "Views were never forced on us. They exposed us to a variety of opinions. I came out confident in the Jewish community in Canada."

Welcome new journals

A relatively new publication has appeared on the Jewish literary horizon. Given the current existential and physical stresses throughout the Jewish world, it is an especially propitious moment to welcome the Jerusalem Review into the exceptionally rich, expanding world of Hebrew arts and culture. Published twice-yearly in Israel by Ah'shav Association, a non-profit organization, the English language Jerusalem Review is an impressive journal.

Four volumes of the journal have already been published. The fifth volume is expected shortly.

Steering the Review is an eminent panel of thinkers, scholars, writers and philosophers from Israel, North America, England and continental Europe.

Sir Isaiah Berlin, the late renowned scholar/philosopher was the first chairman of the Review's international board. Gabriel- Moked is the Review's editor; Aharon Appelfeld is its advisory editor. Both Moked and Appelfeld are pre-eminent in Israel in their respective fields of philosophy and literature.

Seymour Mayne, the acclaimed and widely read poet/writer from Ottawa, is one of the journal's contributing editors. Joining Mayne as contributing editors are such distinguished individuals as Nicholas de Lange, George Steiner and Bernard-Henri Levy from the U.K. and western Europe, and Robert B. Alter, Michael Walzer and Leon Wieseltier from the U.S.

Each issue of the journal brings together nearly 250 pages of the highest- calibre essays, prose, poetry and photojournalism, distinctively and pleasingly presented on high-quality, colour-friendly stock paper.

Moked and Appelfeld have written that the aims of the Review are "to foster the links between Israel and the rest of the Jewish world, as well as to make Hebrew literature and Jewish thought better known and appreciated." A formal statement of the journal's goals appears in Volume 4. In part, it says: "The Jerusalem Review wishes to emphasize both the pluralism and the unique character of spiritual, cultural, literary and artistic tendencies in Israel. Despite the small number of Hebrew speakers and readers, Hebrew is one of the classical languages of West and East alike, and perhaps the only classical language spoken today... Our journal seeks to transcend the barrier of language and to foster a genuine dialogue between Israel and the Diaspora, based on a mutual exploration of cultural issues and reflections on the many dimensions of Jewish heritage."

Some observers might find within the mission statement a veiled left-of-centre socio-political agenda. Indeed, the editors openly profess that, "concerning political issues, we shall try to provide expression primarily for the body of opinion defined as liberal." But the finding of such an agenda is unwarranted and acts as a potential blinder over the reader's eyes, preventing her from "reaching" some of the remarkable writing within the publication's pages.

In the final analysis, the literature in the Review transcends political affiliations or inclinations. The diverse array of writers assures this. Readers will be able to confirm this for themselves.

Another relatively new publication, much closer to home, is Jews and Judaism in Canada: A Bibliography of Works Published Since 1965, which was recently published by the Centre for Jewish Studies, York University. It is a special edition of the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies, compiled by Michael Brown, Richard Menkis, Benjamin Schlesinger and Stuart Schoenfeld.

This work is an invaluable resource for teachers, students, scholars, researchers – indeed, for anyone interested in the Canadian Jewish community. Some 1,600 entries are recorded in the bibliography under 60 different topics – a wide offering of subjects related to the Canadian Jewish experience.

In addition to providing a storehouse of important information regarding Jewish life in Canada, the text is also, itself, a record of the evolution of that experience over the past four decades.

The bibliography contains an informative though brief foreword by the late scholar Daniel J. Elazar, made more poignant by his passing last year. Prof. Elazar insightfully notes that "Canadian Jewry has become more like American Jewry, although still with substantial differences reflecting the two countries' generally different institutional frameworks. Canadian Jewry is still an oligopolistic marketplace, while American Jewry is far more varied and even anarchic."

This unique bibliography, then, is an appropriate starting point to further study our "oligopolistic marketplace."

Federation restructures governing body

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Toronto's federation is going corporate – at least in terms of its governance structure.

Among the changes will be the elimination of the 40-member board of governors, which met on an annual basis and had a limited role, primarily to review and approve the budget.

In future the federation will operate with one board, the board of directors. The board of governors, established about a decade ago with 120 members including all the directors, was reduced in size 1½ years ago.

There will also be new titles for the federation's top lay and professional leaders. Executive director Allan Reitzes will be known as the organization's president, and the lay leader, who now bears the title of president, will become the chairman of the board.

The changes, which were passed by the board of directors at a June 21 meeting, are expected to be implemented this fall. They reflect a trend in non-profit organizations both within and outside the Jewish community and were made with "a view to getting significant donors more intimately involved," said Joey Steiner, a former federation president who chaired the committee set up earlier this year to review the governance of UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto. The dozen-member committee included both board members and non-members.

Historically, most board members have come from affiliated agencies or have worked their way up through committees, said Steiner. Donors are elected to the board in the same way as any other member.

The magnitude of current federation projects – specifically Jewish Toronto Tomorrow, which will see the development or redevelopment of three Jewish "campuses" from York Region to downtown – "really requires the major donors and fund-raisers to be deeply immersed in the issues," said Steiner.

Also, donors are more interested in understanding the projects they're supporting, he added.

And the federation wants their input, said the organization's president Alan Sandler.

Glennie Lindenberg, a member of the governance committee, said she thinks the new structure will be more inviting for donors who want to become involved in overall decision-making.

"We hope that this new structure will be more hands-on," said Lindenberg.

The current board reflects a cross-section of the Jewish community regarding level of giving and denominational affiliation, she said. "That is something we want to maintain, because that is something that benefits the community."

Part of the impetus, according to Sandler, was a feeling of frustration among board members over the past four to six years because of the amount of time spent micromanaging and getting reports from subcommittees. "We're looking to get the board to become more strategic," he said. "The community's too big now to run as it has in the past."

The federation will continue to focus on four main areas, Sandler explained. They are:

- community planning, including the Board of Jewish Education and anything social or cultural;
- fund-raising;
- administration; and
- endowment funds.

The chairs of the four committees dealing with those areas will automatically sit on the executive, said Sandler.

Lindenberg thinks the new structure has "a tremendous amount of potential. I think that it's going to be more inclusive of more members of the community."

Although there will still be approximately the same number of directors, Lindenberg believes greater inclusivity will be a byproduct of the way the board meetings will be run. "They'll be more involved in setting policy and strategic planning, and the larger issues facing the community. As a board, we're not going to be dealing with day-to-day operations. Those will be dealt with by the executive [which will consist of about a dozen members]."

The executive is expected to meet monthly, while the larger board of directors will meet quarterly.

Lastman on 'hot seat' at BJD

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

TORONTO — The Black-Jewish Dialogue (BJD) wound down for the summer though dialogue at the organization's closing session was intense following the recent comments made by Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman.

Members condemned comments made by Lastman two weeks ago before visiting Kenya about being boiled in a pot by natives, but the group was divided as to how they should view Lastman in the future.

Some argued that Lastman's comments should be balanced against his commitment to improving race relations in the city. Others were less forgiving.

"His comments negate anything positive he did. What he said was from his heart," said Fred Pokv-Bonsu, chair of the Sanicofa Heritage Foundation and member of the Guanaian Association of Ontario, addressing the crowd of about 40. He argued that whatever Lastman has done to promote acceptance and multi-culturalism was politically motivated.

Many members felt that Lastman's gaffe was an opportunity for the BJD to attack racism head on.

"I don't want the media to act as if racism doesn't exist until a comment is made," said Barbara Thompson, a member of the Black community.

"I know racism exists because I encounter it on a daily basis, but I don't like that the community should act so vigorously because of what was said. I don't necessarily believe Lastman is racist... [but] this is an opportunity to talk about [the issue] because racism is out there."

Members agreed that next year, the BJD has to be more proactive, rather than just reactive in order to build bridges between the Jewish and Black communities.

The Black and Jewish community alliance was initially forged in the 1940s when they began to work together to address issues of human rights.

"We began to badger the government, and after a number of years the Fair Accommodations Act and the Fair Employment Practices Act were passed," said Morley Wolfe, co-chair of BJD.

"We realized that we had a lot more power working together than working separately. This applies today – we can do more things and faster when we come together to work for the common good."

Though in recent years the two groups acknowledged that they had begun to move apart, the communities reunited two years ago with an"escalated" BJD program of monthly meetings after a B'nai Brith study showed that anti-Semitism and racism were on the rise.

Lorne Foster, a sociologist and program co-ordinator for the B'nai Brith League for Human Rights agreed that this isn't the best time to call it quits for the summer.

"I regret stopping meetings in light of recent events, but in the summer people disperse. We will still hold steering committee meetings in the summer to address the direction the BJD will take. We'll pick up again in the fall with a big youth forum," said Hunter.

"Lastman's comments just reaffirm my commitment to the BJD."

Tories approve school tax credit

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish groups were pleased with last week's quick passage of Bill 45, the Ontario government's controversial legislation giving tax credits to parents of children in private schools.

After weeks of protest, public hearings and debate, the Tories' overall budget bill, of which the tax credit was a small part, passed without debate by a vote of 50-35.

The measure will phase in a provincial tax credit of up to $3,500 per child per year by 2006.

All Liberals and New Democrats in the legislature voted en bloc against the budget.

Robert Samery, head of Jewish Parents for Equality in Education Funding, said it was noteworthy that Liberal leader Dalton McGuinty, who vehemently opposed the tax credit, was not in the house for the vote.

Samery also pointed out that Liberal MPP Monte Kwinter, who favoured the tax plan, with reservations, voted against the budget, as did Liberal Michael Bryant, another supporter of the credit.

Overall, "we're very happy," Samery noted, but "still vigilant of what the regulations will say. We hope they will do nothing to diminish the value of the bill."

Talks between communal officials and bureaucrats in the finance ministry will continue over the summer to iron out details of the plan, including how it will affect parents whose tuition fees are subsidized by the community.

The government will also decide on a list of schools that will be eligible to issue receipts for the tax credit.

In a statement, Ed Morgan, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said the bill "is an extremely important step toward ending Ontario's historic inequity in funding religious education and in extending school choice to all parents in this province."

Criticism of the bill was "based on conjecture," he said. CJC feels that over time, taxpayers will reconcile themselves with the measure, as it "becomes a natural part of the landscape in education policy."

CJC said it also hopes to work with McGuinty, who has stated he would repeal the tax plan should the Liberals form the next government. Recent polls put them well ahead of the Conservatives.

Samery said his group met just prior to the vote with finance minister Jim Flaherty, Attorney General David Young and Thornhill MPP Tina Molinari to thank them for having supported the tax credit.

ANOTHER 'HOT' DAY: Volunteers from UJA FEDERATION's Young Leadership division help sort clothes at the newly re-opened Just A Second Shop as part of their Hands On Toronto program. The Bathurst Street store, which was gutted by fire in January, is operated by Jewish Family and Child Service and sells used clothing and household items.

Leadership's essence: setting an example

Individuals who hold public office owe a duty of care to the public they serve, to the people on whose behalf they exercise the lawful authority of their office. In our western democratic tradition, it is a well established doctrine, dating back to the "accountability" demanded of kings and sovereigns as recorded in the Tanach, that this duty of care gives rise to very high standards of public behaviour.

It is not the level of public office that imposes the duty and the resultant standard of care. Rather, it is the mere fact of the office, the holding of authority that gives rise to the duty and thus also to the standard in furtherance of the duty.

Pursuant to that standard of care, we demand and expect a great deal of our public officials: honesty, incorruptibility, trustworthiness and fairness, to name but a few of the qualities that are sine qua non for public officials. We do not, however, demand perfect judgment. We cannot because none exists. We can only demand the exercise of the best, bona fide, reasonable judgment in the circumstances.

Last week, in three discreet examples at the municipal level of government, our elected officials fell far below the minimum standard of behaviour we expect of them. In each instance, their judgment was far less than reasonable; it was profoundly poor.

Outremont. Judge Allan Hilton of the Quebec Superior Court upheld the right of Outremont's Jews to erect an eruv in that community. The City of Outremont and an intervenor group had illogically and incorrectly argued that the eruv violated the city's secular status. Inasmuch as the eruv itself is virtually invisible and requires no expenditure of public funds, the city's objection was hollow, callously insensitive, exclusionary and religiously intolerant.

York Region. The York Region District School Board publicly distanced itself from the offensive behaviour of a member of the board's race relations advisory committee. Last April, at a workshop on the subject of teaching the Holocaust, Bader Abu-Zahra distributed copies of a review of a widely known, widely condemned, highly inflammatory work that questions many aspects of the Holocaust. The "distancing" decision by the board is only partially remedial. More should be done; hopefully more will be done by the board to ensure such behaviour does not recur. Abu-Zahra's behaviour too was callous. Moreover, it was utterly at odds with the very aims of committee of which he is a member.

Toronto. The mayor of Toronto, Mel Lastman, resorted to buffoonish, cartoonish stereotypes of native black Africans during off-the-cuff remarks about an impending trip to Kenya. Alas, this behaviour too was inappropriate to say the least, shockingly insensitive and hurtful.

In all three instances, our public officials fell below the minimum standard expected of them. They failed to use bona fide, reasonable judgment in the circumstances. But in failing thus, they failed in a far more significant way. They failed leadership's most essential responsibility: to set a worthy, moral, thoughtful example for the public.

Romania should admit atrocities

I was born in the city of Iasi, Romania. On June 29, 1941, General Ion Antonescu ordered the Romanian army, local police and Iron Guard to descend to the Jewish quarters to slaughter 11,200 Jewish men, women and children.

Romania has never acknowledged the destruction of any of its Jewish communities between 1941 and 1945. Today, this lack of admission and historical accuracy has resulted in approximately 10 statues of Antonescu, depicting him as a Romanian hero.

In Romania's recent election, a well-known extreme right anti-Semite and fascist leader, Tudor Vadim, was elected president with approximately 30 percent of the vote. It is President Iliescu's responsibility to follow in the footsteps of past president Constantinescu, as well as the president of Poland, by admitting to these past atrocities.

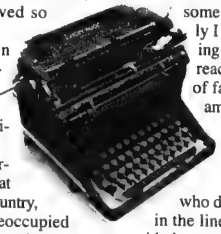
Peace with Palestinians probable

For all those pessimists who feel that peace between Israelis and Palestinians is impossible, they have only to examine the history of the 20th century to find much cause for optimism.

Just 60 years ago, America and Japan were locked in an all-out death struggle. Now they are at peace, trading prolifically and admiring each others' culture.

The Jewish people's previous mortal enemies were the Germans. Now Jews drive German-made cars and German tourists visit Israel and try to understand how their parents could have behaved so wrongly.



The same process will happen in Israel. Borders will be set up separating Israelis and Palestinians, and the current state of hostilities will end. Even Jerusalem will somehow be similarly calmed.

The overwhelming weight of historical evidence supports the likelihood that when the Palestinians have their own country, separated from Israel, they will be preoccupied with building it, not with tearing down the Jewish State. Peace is not only possible, it's probable.

Kudos to Asper

Regarding your article "Asper slams Canada's ME policy" (CJN, June 28), Israel Asper is to be commended for his vigorous public defence of the embattled Jewish State. Canada's problematic Mideast policy and the inability or unwillingness of the organized Jewish community to present Israel's case effectively is disturbing. Israeli Jews feel increasingly isolated from Diaspora Jews. While the slogan "we are one" may make the hearts of Canadian Jewry swell with pride, if it is not accompanied by positive action, then "we are alone" may be more and more an accurate reflection of the reality of life in Israel today!

Russian immigrants offer support

As immigrants from the former Soviet Union, we are very distraught and shocked by the recent bombing at the Tel-Aviv discotheque. It was a massacre of young teenagers who came to Israel for a better and brighter future.

We want to do something within our means to work with the Canadian Jewish Congress and the FEDERATION CJA to offer our support to the families and friends of the martyrs. We would also like to give our support to the Israeli government and to all others who are doing the utmost to prevent such destruction from taking place against our people, in Israel and wherever else they may be.

Birthright feeling: Am Yisrael Chai

I have just returned from a 10-day Birthright trip to Eretz Yisrael. During this time, I experienced some of the best days of my life. Unfortunately I cannot say the same for the time preceding my journey. The success of terrorism has reached the Jews of Toronto, with their lack of faith illustrated through words such as "I am really scared for you, Hannah," or "Now is just not the time to go."

I asked myself, when is the time to go?

I wondered if the young Israeli soldiers who defend our country by putting themselves in the line of fire for us everyday get bombarded with the same kind of discouraging words. They stand in places that most organized trips would not even dream of taking us, guarding the kibbutzim along the Lebanese border and the communities living within the West Bank. Are the Jewish lives in Toronto more sacred than those in Israel?

Am Yisrael Chai... I will be here for them as they are there for me.

Turkey's Jews: A rich legacy

By GARY RUSAK

I recently travelled to Turkey, a land of rich historical significance for Jewish people. I did not go specifically to study Jewish history, but the places I encountered echoed with a Jewish consciousness. The long and storied history of our people in the land of Turkey is one that could fill up many books and university lectures, yet I found scant traces of any thriving Jewish culture there now.

My first destination was Istanbul. Formerly known as Constantinople, the city was once the centre of both the Byzantine and the Ottoman empires. The Christian Byzantine Empire was infamous for genocide and forced conversions of its Jewish minority. The subsequent Ottoman Empire has a very different legacy.

Historians pinpoint the start of the Jewish-Ottoman story to 1492 when the Spanish king exiled all Jewish subjects from his country. Although this is accurate, it should also be noted that Jewish migration to the east, as a consequence of Christian persecution in Spain, had been going on for nearly three centuries by the time of the exile. The Islamic Ottoman Empire had always opened its doors wide and accepted fleeing Jewish immigrants. As a result, 100,000 to 250,000 Jews entered the Ottoman Empire in the 15th century. The prosperous nature of this relationship is reflected in the numbers: in the 17th century, there were an estimated 100,000 Jews in Istanbul alone.

While in Istanbul, I toured the lavish grounds of Topkapi Palace, where the royal family once ruled the vast empire. I walked upon the same stones as many of the empire's wealthiest and most powerful subjects during the height of Ottoman's power between the 15th and 17th centuries. I was heartened to know that some well-known Jews had managed to secure themselves in high positions at the palace. Among them were Josef Hamon, who was the royal family's personal physician for some time, and Don Joseph, who held a position as a diplomatic agent and reported directly to the sultan. These men, among others, were powerful voices for the Jewish minority.

The positions of a privileged few aside, Jewish culture flourished during the golden years of Ottoman rule. The empire consistently provided its Jewish population with protection and freedom. The sultans even instituted a form of Jewish self-government. An appointed chief rabbi was in charge of enforcing Jewish laws and customs. The chief rabbi also had the important duty of reporting any anti-Semitic activity directly to the sultan, who then swiftly dealt with the matter. The Jewish population was afforded special protection, never suffering under the institutionalized anti-Semitism that riddled old Byzantine laws. By most accounts, the Jewish experience at this time was an affluent one, with general economic and social advancement throughout the empire.

On my way out of the palace's well-manicured gardens, I came across a ruined outer gate. As I looked upon the once mighty fortification, I was reminded that time has a way of eroding even the most stable institutions.

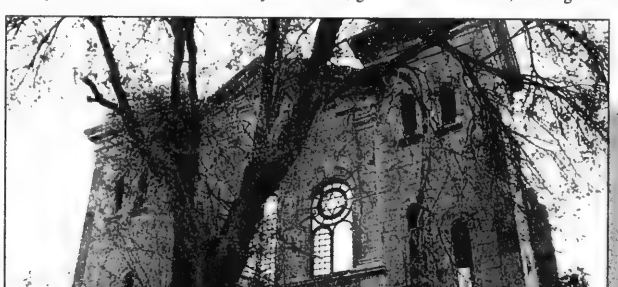
Likewise, the affluence and protection of the golden age was not to last. The 19th century was marked by a steady decline in the economic and political fortunes of the once great empire and the Jewish culture within its borders. The rising European nation states and the infiltration of Christian anti-Semitism into the higher echelons of the political system were ominous signs for Ottoman-Jewish culture. At first, it was Jews on the edge of the dying empire who suffered: the Jewish communities in Greece, Hungary and Romania were subjected to tormenting violence and hatred for supporting the battered empire. Soon, however, all Jews in the empire were affected.

When the Turkish-Russian war, along with the Napoleonic campaigns, put stress on the Ottoman economy, Turkish papers began humming with allegations against Jewish merchants for defrauding the government and military. These false accusations fanned the flames of nationalistic Turkish Muslims who were already restless for a change in government. By the 1880s, government officials, reacting to internal pressure, began to tighten Jewish immigration and apply pressure to the Jewish settlement already established in Ottoman-controlled Palestine.



An abandoned synagogue in Edrine.

In 1908, the Young Turks revolution marked a major break with the past. Unfortunately, as increased freedom was afforded to the population, increased attacks on Jewish people and their property followed. The interim government even expelled 10,000 indigenous Jews from the area that soon became known as Palestine.

World War I finally spelled the official end of the Ottoman Empire. Following years of Allied occupation and a bloody war for independence, the Republic of Turkey was established in 1923. The new government, led by General Kemal Ataturk, was fervently nationalistic and determined to set itself apart from the old Ottoman rule.

The republic immediately revoked the special rights and privileges that the Ottomans had granted the Jews centuries earlier. Jewish marriages were outlawed, as was the teaching of Hebrew in schools. No special religious clothing was allowed on the streets and no affiliation with organizations such as the World Zionist Organization or the World Jewish Congress was permitted at all. Despite these censoring measures, the chief rabbi, Hayim Behor Bejerano, led Turkish Jewry in support of the new republic. He judged Ataturk to be a leader who was taking the necessary steps to establish a democracy that would eventually favour the well-being of all Turkish Jewry. Yet some Jewish communities suffered greatly under the new government.

The small city of Edrine is nestled near the Bulgarian border about two hours north of Istanbul. I came there specifically to marvel at the world's most intricately designed mosques. The map I received from the tourist office also indicated that a synagogue was in the area. With the hope of participating in Friday night services, I naively followed the map's directions to the shul. Once there, I found nothing more then a fenced-off ruin. The remains of stained-glass windows were scattered amongst broken chunks of a concrete Star of David that must have sat atop the now forgotten synagogue. To my disappointment, the shul had been abandoned many years earlier.

I soon learned that in 1934, the Turkish government passed bill No. 2510 restricting the area of Eastern Thrace to people of Turkish origin. The bill was aimed at removing Greek residents from historic city of Edrine. But it also caused the forcible removal of 10,000 Jews and the destruction of the city's many ancient shuls. These Jews relocated to Istanbul, but their security in the new republic was now in question.

Fearing another disastrous occupation, Turkey managed to remain neutral during the horrors of World War II. The government did not yield to Nazi pressure to surrender their Jewish community. Despite this brave action, the picture of Turkey as a friend of the Jewish community during these years gets a little blurry upon closer inspection.

On Feb. 24, 1942, the tragic sinking of the Sturma in the Black Sea forever changed the relationship between Turkey and its Jewish inhabitants. The ship, which was filled with 769 Polish Jews fleeing genocide in Europe, was denied access to Istanbul's ports by Turkish officials. At the time, the Turkish government was under pressure from British authorities not to allow Jews in the country. Political manoeuvring and a blatant disregard for human life guided the authorities in their callous decision to deny the boat's entrance. The ship was left to sink; the lives of all but one of its passengers were needlessly lost.

The Turkish Jewish community, feeling deserted in a time of need and upset over a new draconian tax law that specifically targeted Jewish merchants, reacted to the tragedy, one-quarter of them leaving for the new State of Israel in 1949. The exodus continued throughout the 1960s and 1970s due to economic uncertainty and increasing anti-Semitic incidents in Istanbul, Izmir and Cyprus. Today, only 25,000 Jews remain in the country, the majority of them living in Istanbul.

While on my trip, I asked many people where I might find a synagogue. Outside of Istanbul, I received nothing but blank stares. Clearly, Turkey today is not the centre of Jewish culture it once was. Nevertheless, it should be remembered that Turkey was the first Muslim country to recognize the State of Israel and has since played an important role helping Jewish refugees escape persecution in Iran and Syria. Turkey is also Israel's second leading trading partner after the United States and has always been a rare good friend in the region.

The Turkish-Jewish legacy is a rich one that has evolved over the years. Today, many Turkish Jews in Israel owe their very existence to the country they left behind.

More on Israel and Reform

My column of June 21 critiqued Rabbi Eric Yoffie's cancellation of youth trips to Israel for security reasons. The decision was criticized most severely by Jerusalem's Mayor Ehud Olmert, who hinted that the city would sever its ties to the Reform Jewish community.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I was quite shocked at this extreme reaction, especially since it was aimed at Jews who have made Israel their home. I therefore have decided to let you read a portion of the response that the new President of Hebrew Union College, Rabbi David Ellenson, wrote to Olmert:

"In 1930, Hebrew Union College alumnus and Reform Rabbi Judah Leon Magnes, the first chancellor of Hebrew University, wrote: 'The Jew will not abandon the land of Israel.'

"The Reform movement in Israel and the Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion (HUC-JIR) today affirm the sentiments expressed first by Rabbi Magnes almost 70 years ago. Our ties to Israel are absolute.

"Our HUC-JIR campus in Jerusalem, a vibrant educational and cultural presence in your city since 1963, which you have visited and can view from your City Hall office, is a tangible confirmation of our dedication to a vital Zionist engagement binding Israel and North American Reform Jewry. But it is Israel itself which is the classroom for our students, where they immerse themselves in the fabric of everyday Israeli life and establish lifelong ties that inspire their leadership as the rabbis, cantors and educators for Reform Jewry and klal Yisrael.

"We are proud that during the past 30 years, over 1,400 of our alumni – leaders of the Reform congregations, educational institutions and Jewish communal agencies throughout the world – have spent their mandatory first year of study at our Jerusalem school. Starting next week, 65 North American first-year HUC-JIR students will arrive in Jerusalem for their year of study as they begin their journeys as Jewish professionals. Our commitment as an institution to these programs will brook no compromise, and we are proud that our students understand the importance this year plays in their formation as Jewish leaders.

"As the newly chosen president of Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion, my family and I will be in Jerusalem for the summer – part of a lifelong devotion to teaching and living in Israel. I invite you to join me in welcoming our North American first-year students and visit our thriving campus with its manifold programs.

"I look forward to hearing from you. With heartfelt wishes for peace and security for our beloved Israel."

Rabbi Ellenson's letter was dated June 11. So far (as of June 21), I have not heard any response from the mayor.

Israel's water sources frighteningly scarce

Every few days, at the end of the nightly newscast on Channel 1, chief meteorologist Sharon Wexler wraps up her weather forecast with a colourful illustration updating the situation of Lake Kinneret. The drawing style is always playful, but the message is not. Like some ominous metaphor for the current state of the nation, Israel's main source of fresh water is cause for growing alarm.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Even before the summer began, the Kinneret was a shadow of its former self. Three years of severe drought and minimal rainfall have taken their toll.

The result is a sad, disturbing sight. The shoreline has receded drastically and it's anyone's guess as to how much more of the lake will disappear over the next several months. As things stand now, the Kinneret's water level – like that of many of Israel's underground reservoirs and coastal aquifers – is already well below the emergency "red line," with the next rain not expected until October.

The country may be facing its worst water crisis ever, but you'd barely know it from looking. Apathetic Israelis continue their routine with nary a worry for how much H_20 they use. Everywhere you go you see people washing their cars, watering their gardens, hosing down sidewalks. Local authorities are still planting water-guzzling plants and flowerbeds while operating sprinklers in the middle of the day in parks and at other sites, as if Israel were located in Canada. At the same time, the country's agricultural sector persists in growing crops that require a disproportionately huge amount of water, crops that are heavily subsidized by the government.

A couple of weeks ago, both the national infrastructure minister and the water commissioner issued instructions to all local authorities nationwide to reduce water consumption by five percent or face the threat of disruptions in supplies of fresh water. This followed a report that most towns and cities had failed to meet water-saving targets that they had agreed to last year. The water commission's figures showed that urban consumption of water in May was identical to what it was a year earlier despite repeated calls to conserve every drop. Water specialists charged both local authorities and the public with indifference bordering on irresponsibility.

Admittedly, the armed conflict with the Palestinians hasn't helped matters much. Since the violence erupted last fall, it has dominated the public agenda, deflecting attention somewhat from the water crisis. Still, that's no reason for the country to be caught so ill-prepared for a calamity that is anything but a surprise.

The signs have long been apparent for all to see. In recent years, in true Israeli style, the problem has been discussed, debated, deliberated, dissected – and dismissed until a later date by government officials. Today, the country is paying a hefty price for such shortsightedness and bureaucratic inertia. It's this same approach that has led to other major problems in the country's transportation, public health and education systems.

As if the declining quantity of Israel's already modest water resources was not worrisome enough, experts say its quality is no less reason for concern.

In the absence of tough environmental action against industrial pollution, the state of the country's drinking water is steadily deteriorating and now represents a ticking time bomb for the nation's health.

Agreed, Israel's hydrology situation is not simple due to the country's climate, lack of natural fresh water bodies, growing population and increased standard of living. Yet many available solutions could go a long way to alleviating the problem if only the political will and budget were there to fully implement them.

Piecemeal measures will no longer cut it. Importing water in ships from Turkey as planned is, at best, only a temporary, partial solution. Its potential for problems is considerable.

Water must become a top national priority supported by a multi-billion dollar policy of massive desalination plants, strict rationing, public education and better conservation and allocation of the country's limited water resources. Anything less is an irresponsible dereliction of duty by the government that will endanger present and future generations.

Game delayed by terror

In the past few years, baseball has gained a foothold in Israeli cities. The children of North American olim are playing ball, and their parents are coaching, cheering, and even playing in adult leagues. The joys of baseball on the grass (or weeds) of Jerusalem's diamonds on a summer evening are the best prescription to calm the nerves during tense times.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The chatter is generally a mixture of English in Israeli accents with Hebrew slang. The kids talk to each other in Hebrew, but the shouts of "good eye", "wait for your pitch." "let's get two," and "hey ump, where'd ya forget your glasses" are familiar.

Sitting in the concrete benches watching our kids play ball, or coaching the bases, takes us universes away from the war and terror that is going on all around us. On a good day, we get through an entire game without hearing a bomb go off, the sound of ambulances, or gunfire from the Gilo neighborhood nearby (and the frequent target of Palestinian shooting). But on other days, we have less luck. In Jerusalem in the summer, rain-delays are very rare (although we did cancel a few games in spring training when the fields were too muddy). Instead, we have to cope with bomb-scare delays.

A few weeks ago, in the middle of a close game, (not much of a pitcher's duel : the score for both teams was in double digits, and "everyone hits"), a police bullhorn told everyone to clear the field immediately. Two bomb-squad vans pulled up on the street along right field, and closed it at both ends. The sappers in their protective gear came out slowly and began to exam the suspicious looking briefcase on the sidewalk, and the police repeated their orders to stay off the field.

For North Americans, a baseball game held up by a bomb scare in the middle of a very dirty war is a scenario from another planet. It just doesn't make any sense. But for Binyamin (3B), Eliya (1B) and Elisha (CF), Esther (RF), Shmaya (C), and Aharon Dov (batting over .900), this is part of their everyday experience. The morning papers and ever-present radio news bulletins tell them of Israelis killed by Palestinian snipers on the roads the night before, or of other kids murdered in a shopping mall or disco. They have grown up with bus bombings, gas masks, and chemical warfare drills in school. A bomb-scare delay in the middle of a baseball game is no big deal.

Despite the baseball caps and other reflections of American culture, this generation of Israelis is just as tough as the earlier ones. Arafat's strategy of terror has brought the common goals of Jewish survival and national unity back in full force. When the bombing and shooting finally end, we will still be here, continuing the work of Zionism and the renaissance of the Jewish people in its homeland.

Israel's latest war will not end with the surrender of the enemy forces, or victory celebrations in Jerusalem or Tel Aviv. The decisive weapons are not F-16s or Merkava tanks, but rather the intelligence to avoid the traps set by Arafat's campaign of terror. The heroes include the intelligence services that pinpoint the location of terrorists (some, but unfortunately not all), the soldiers that go after them, and the public that refuses to bow to terror.

Real peace – as distinct from the imitation advertised under the Oslo banner – will only come when differences are settled without bombs and hatred. Instead of the frequent and well-publicized shuttle trips around the capitals of the Middle East, eager peace-makers should invest their energies in bringing the joys of summer baseball to our troubled region. When the baseballers of Jerusalem, such as Bagel Bite and Kol Hakavod, play a friendly game against their counterparts in Amman, Cairo, Beirut and even Damascus, that will mean peace has finally come.

Jewish Life

Choice makes heretics of us all

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

For the lady whom we overheard the other day calling another Jew a heretic, I offer the following. Heresy derives from the Greek "heiresis," meaning to choose. Modernity can be properly defined as the movement from fate to choice. To put it another way, modernity pluralizes in a way that makes it impossible not to choose. Simply put, we are all heretics.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

One of the reasons that Jewish unity is so hard to achieve today is because of these modern conditions. It's not because Jews are nastier than they were in the past or that we don't care for one another now. It's because today we live in a world with a radically different order of things.

The premodern Jew – and non-Jew for that matter – lived in a world of fate. Instead of a wide array of technological gadgets and gizmos, he had a limited array of helper tools. And this only addresses the technological end of things. On every other level, he was fated by his culture, by his community, by his lack of financial and geographical mobility.

From the availability of contraception, to the trade you plied, to the village where you spent your years – chances were you would do what your ancestors had done. You would pray to their God and carry out their traditions, not simply because you believed in them, though doubtless most people did, but because there was not really any choice. You would live where they lived and be buried among them. This was the reality presented to you – there was no other; it constituted what the sociologist Alfred Schutz has called "the life taken for granted": life is like this; it is silly to even contemplate another way.

To tell someone from the fourteenth century that he could get into a big box with wings and be halfway across the world by the end of the day would be as absurd as telling them that Halachah isn't really binding or that scores of non-Jewish women would love to marry Jewish men, or that there would be gay synagogues or that you could drive to shul on Shabbat. Or that the same person, say, whose father was Jewish and whose mother was not, would be defined as a Jew by some Jews and emphatically not by others. Such plurality wouldn't simply have been frowned upon or spurned in days gone by. Such plurality was a non-sequitur.

Jewish education has been fairly slow in catching up to the consequences of what all of this entails. There is a feeling that somehow we can teach the same old subjects in slightly newer ways, and if we do it with enough enthusiasm and caring, then we will help our students to become better, more literate Jews. This "old wine in new casks" is perhaps a perilous philosophy at the end of the day. Until we come face to face with the starkness of what a universe of choice means, we will not be able to fully attack the key question of education: can the eternal Law be reconciled with the massive shift in contemporary morals, interests and belief systems? One thing is certain: dismissing others as heretics is an act of fear, and these are times which require courage of the first order, so that we do not look up in years hence and wonder what happened to the Jewish people.

Hebrew program in Vancouver

By MARLANE PRESS
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Instructors Rahel Halabe and Shoshana Hofman are working together again to bring a traditional Hebrew language experience to Vancouver for the second annual mini-Ulpan program.

Because of the success and overwhelming response to last year's inaugural program, a new course has been added this summer.

"A first level is something we did not offer last year," Halabe said. "It's for people who may have started learning Hebrew this year and for people who may have started many times in the past but never continued. Here we want to give them a push ahead."

Level aleph (one) requires the student to have worked on any Israeli ulpan Level aleph, or to have completed Ora Band Shalav Aleph or equivalent. Level beit students should have completed the Level aleph textbook, Ora Band Shalav Beit or equivalent.

Prepared by Halabe, a sessional teacher at the Vancouver School of Theology who teaches a course in biblical Hebrew, the curriculum is intended to enrich students' vocabulary, encourage them to read Hebrew books, improve their conversation skills and deepen their understanding of Hebrew grammar.

"We've tried to balance the instruction," Halabe said. "So we have some grammar and some story time, as well as games like Hebrew Monopoly and field trips."

For example, students have the opportunity to test their new knowledge in some of Vancouver's Hebrew-speaking establishments. Optional outings like movies and field trips are something the two instructors like to offer, as five hours in an intensive language program can become exhausting and overwhelming for the students. Last summer, some students opted out of the outings; however, most students chose to join in on trips to Granville Island for shopping and sitting down and enjoying a cup of coffee.

"One day we went shopping on Main Street for antiques and stopped in a coffee shop where the owner was fluent in Hebrew. It was an extra surprise for the owner and for us – I had not known that she was able to speak Hebrew," Halabe said.

"Another day we watched an Israeli movie and as part of the curriculum we visited Sabra's restaurant, where I translated the menu so everyone could order in Hebrew. The owners were completely prepared to serve only in Hebrew and the conversation around the table was in Hebrew. It was really fun.'

Level aleph runs Aug. 20 to 24. Level beit runs Aug. 27 to 31. Each course costs $300 if students register before July 14. After that, the cost is $350. Books and material are $35. Both courses will be held at the Jewish Community Centre. Access to the JCC's facilities during the five-day course is free.

Class sizes will be limited and may be subdivided to accommodate different rates of learning, and all students will have exposure to both instructors, Halabe said.

"If the level of student ability within the same class varies greatly, we will have faster and slower paced groups, but the maximum in each class will be 12. We will also alternate teaching time so that students will be exposed to both instructors, who have different styles in teaching, speech and pronunciation,"she said. "I've got a Sephardi accent and Shoshana has the more regular Ashkenazi accent. They're very different."

For evaluation of your Hebrew level, contact Halabe at rahel@telus.net or 604-879-2677. You may also register online at www.jccgv.com.

Re-examing the Bible

The Bible Unearthed*, by Israel Finkelstein and Neil Asher Silberman, Simon and Schuster.

Rabbi David Wolpe is spiritual leader of Sinai Temple in Los Angeles, a large and prestigious Conservative congregation. Several months ago, on Passover eve, he preached a sermon that caused a furor in the community. He told his congregation that archeologists had discovered no evidence in the Sinai Desert to support the biblical account of the Exodus.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Responding to a barrage of criticism, especially from Orthodox sources, the rabbi explained that Passover should be observed "for its deeper and more central meaning," as giving Jews a way to understand the pattern of their history, with liberation following enslavement through the idea of a God of freedom.

He continued, "Our children will learn of this anyway – better to learn it from a rabbi in the context of faith. Otherwise, when they hear it from a college professor they will conclude that the rabbi was peddling fairy tales for the credulous."

Rabbi Wolpe may have derived his information from the book under consideration, by two eminent scholars, an Israeli archeologist and a Belgian historian. They bring to this bold and provocative volume an impressive record of scholarly research and field experience. Of course, their conclusions will surprise many readers and outrage others.

Their major thesis is that near the end of the seventh century BCE, Josiah became King of Judah. This righteous ruler found the Book of Deuteronomy when the Temple was being renovated and instituted a total religious reformation. According to the authors, it was during his reign or in subsequent decades that the Five Books of Moses were put together, as well as the books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel and Kings.

They write that much of what is commonly taken for granted as accurate history – the stories of the patriarchs, the Exodus, the conquest of Canaan, and even the saga of the glorious, united monarchy of David and Solomon – are, rather, the creative expressions of a powerful religious reform movement that flourished in the kingdom of Judah in the Late Iron Age. "Although these stories may have been based on certain historical kernels, they primarily reflect the ideology and the world-view of the writers. They show how the narrative of the Bible was uniquely suited to further the religious reform and territorial ambitions of Judah during the momentous concluding decades of the seventh century BCE."

In a statement, akin in spirit to that of Rabbi Wolpe's, respectful of the biblical tradition, the authors explain that the Bible's integrity does not depend on historical "proof" of its particular events or personalities. "The power of the biblical saga stems from its being a compelling and coherent narrative expression of the timeless themes of a people's liberation, continuing resistance to oppression, and quest for social equality. It eloquently expresses the deeply rooted sense of shared origins, experiences, and destiny that every human community needs in order to survive."

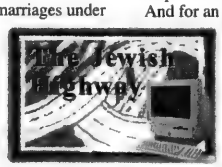
This volume, archeology's new vision of ancient Israel and the origin of its sacred texts, will challenge firmly held beliefs and offer new historic possibilities for the curious and open-minded. Biblical scholar David Freedman writes: "For those who like to be wakened in the morning with a blast of cold water, this book is highly recommended."

Jewish singles & the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

When you think about a matchmaker, images of Yente from Fiddler on the Roof spring to mind. Today, some 21st-century Yentes – and their clients.

In an article from Forward, Susan Shapiro tells of the five marriages under her belt and her "addiction to the fine art of matchmaking" [http://www.forward.com/issues/1998/98.01.09/fastforward.html]. Her career as an amateur matchmaker really began when it dawned on her that they guy she was dating "whose life's dream was to drive a Lamborghini to his estate in the Hamptons" was a far better match for her friend Rachel. They were married six months later. Now that Susan herself is married, she loves her role as matchmaker even more. "I get the voyeuristic thrill of dating and mating monthly without risking rejection, diseases or unwanted pregnancy."



Sherry Singer is a 36-year-old shadchan in Los Angeles who, along with her mother, Eva, has been making matches for 15 years [http://www.jewishjournal.com/08.04.00/singleswills.08.04.00.html]. The mother-daughter team focus on secular, Reform and Conservative Jews and say they are responsible for more than 300 marriages. Although they have a Web site, they say old-fashioned intuition is the best way to make a match [http://www.meetamate.com/].

I was impressed by a short article written by a shadchan who explains how difficult her work is and how shadchanim deserve to be paid accordingly [http://www.countryyossi.com/mar97/shmooze.html]. She quotes the incredible statement in the Gemarah that "bringing two people together in marriage is as difficult as the splitting of the Red Sea" (Sanhedrin 22a). She asks her clients to understand the pressure she is under – and the phone bills she racks up.

And for an insightful portrait on how matchmakers have made the leap from the shtetl to the 21st century, check out Sharon Pomerantz's Playing with Matches in Hadassah magazine [http://www.hadassah.org/news/junejuly00/matches.htm]. She tells the story of the resolve of one client of matchmaker Judi Ehrlich. "My longest-standing client was seven years. He met over 80 women and he married number 82," she says. "People liked him and the fact that he kept persevering was encouraging. I'm glad he didn't give up."

Martin Bodek lives in New York, seems to have done his share of dating and has some advice to pass along [http://members.aol.com/thebodie/#narc]. You can follow him through several articles about Date Jitters, but I want to quote from How to Find Your Bashert. Martin starts with the 6,067,692,010 human beings in the world and then after rejecting almost everyone out there, mathematically proves that there is only one person in the world for you: "Your bashert, your soulmate, your life partner. He/she's just around the corner! Go get him/her!"

By the way, it seems that Martin is a romantic at heart. One way to say thanks for a lovely evening is to send off a big bouquet of virtual flowers – actually that's an e-mail of a picture of some flowers [http://members.aol.com/thebodie/#cards].

Here's a sample from the Big Book of Jewish Humor [http://www.wujs.org.il/activist/features/book_reviews/humor.shtml]. "She looks terrible," the young man reported to the shadchan. "How could I marry a woman who looks like that?"

"Look," replied the shadchan, "either you like Picasso, or you don't!"

Here's another from Zipple [http://www.zipple.com/jokes/twosisters.shtml]. The shadchan goes to see Mr. Cohen, a confirmed bachelor for many years. "Mr Cohen, don't leave it too late. I have exactly the one you need. You only have to say the word and you'll meet and be married in no time!" she says.

"Don't bother," replies Mr Cohen, "I've two sisters at home, who look after all my needs."

"That's all well and good, but all the sisters in the world cannot fill the role of a wife."

"I said two sisters. I didn't say they were mine!"

Looking for love can be wonderful – and painful. Especially if you've been hooked up with the wrong matchmaker. Michael Jacobs has been there and has founded The official Shidduch Survivors' Club [http://www.geocities.com/Paris/Louvre/3376/index.htm]. He includes tips about how to find the right shadchan. "Good Sign: Keeps notes on a printed form. Bad Sign: Scribbles on the back of cigarette packets." And to let you know that you are not alone in your quest, there is a selection of Shidduch Horror Stories – like what to do when you realize that your blind date is someone you've already dated.

Adler retires as principal of Eitz Chaim school

Joe Lebovic (right) hands Rabbi Leibish Adler a cheque to establish a special education program at Eitz Chaim.

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's for the children – all for the children, says Rabbi Leibish Adler, recently retired principal of the Eitz Chaim girls' school.

The goal of education is to bring out the best in each individual child, he told The CJN at a recent interview. Only then should the needs of the parents and the teachers be addressed, he said.

That is not in any way to denigrate the role or position of teachers, said Rabbi Adler. In fact, he believes that "the brightest people should enter the teaching profession. It is the most important job one can do."

That philosophy is the main reason he went into education as a young man liberated from a concentration camp after the war, the only survivor of a large extended family.

"It was the only way I could make good what the Nazis did to us," he said.

Rabbi Adler came to Canada in 1950. "I had an uncle I came to join," he said. The only trouble, he recalled with a laugh, was that his uncle was in Mattawa, near North Bay, and he wound up waiting for him in Ottawa.

At any rate, Rabbi Adler said, he came to Toronto where he was quickly offered teaching positions in the D'Arcy Street Talmud Torah – which became Eitz Chaim – and at Bais Yehuda afternoon school.

Later, he moved to the Burnside campus where he was promoted to supervisor. From there he moved to Viewmount, and then he became vice-principal at the Willowdale campus. In 1975, he was appointed principal at the girls' school at Viewmount.

Teaching is more challenging now than when he began his career, Rabbi Adler said.

"In the beginning, parents accepted everything the teachers said and the kids were expected to obey."

Now, he said, the parents themselves are more educated, both secularly and religiously, and are more demanding.

As well, he said, since so many parents work and lead busy lives, teachers have to function as social workers and psychologists.

He is proud of what he accomplished during his tenure as principal, he said.

At the annual learnathon, children raised money for UJA FEDERATION and learned the importance of being part of the community; the Torah Fair allowed youngsters to demonstrate their talents in whatever direction they lay, academic or otherwise.

He also started continuing education for teachers and introduced the school uniform, which not only ensured the students' adherence to the rules of tzniut, modesty, Rabbi Adler said, but saved them money and gave them the sense of belonging to a group.

"I was always proud when someone called and told me how well-behaved our students were on the bus or on trips. It was a real kiddush HaShem."

He also encouraged the children to correspond with those in Israel who had lost relatives to terrorist acts, and to be sensitive to what happened in the Holocaust.

In all of these endeavours, he said, he was supported by his wife, Bluma, "my partner in everything," who teaches at Eitz Chaim.

In accordance with his philosophy of doing the best for each child, Rabbi Adler said that he was always concerned with children who needed extra help. For that reason, he introduced a program to put assistants in the classrooms. They could take out children on a one-to-one basis, or offer in-class help to the teacher. "This was very effective," he said.

When the board of the school was planning his retirement dinner, developer Joe Lebovic offered to give $100,000 in Rabbi Adler's honour, as seed money for a special education program.

The money would hire four full-time special education specialists, two at the Patricia campus, and one each at the Viewmount and Spring Farm campuses. They will offer testing and follow-up, keep records and teach strategies for learning.

"This will serve as a model for other schools," Rabbi Adler said, noting that the Board of Jewish Education is also moving in this direction.

Although there are some things he would have liked to do, such as providing smaller classes, and more intensive teacher training, "basically, I have no complaints, and no real regrets. I am proud of my family, and proud of my community," he said.

And now? He is still a consultant for the school. He has more time to study, and to visit his daughter and her family in Israel, and he also hopes to write a book about his experiences.

Kelman memorial lecture draws capacity crowd

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The story of Moses and the tablets of the law sends a message that there is always a way back, no matter how low one has fallen, said lecturer Bryna Levy at the recent Ruth Kelman Memorial Lecture.

When Moses brought down the first set, the one he broke, he found the people engaged in idolatry.

"It was the shattering of a dream – the ultimate disappointment, failure and loss," she told a near capacity crowd at Beth Jacob Congregation.

The event was sponsored by the Kelman family, Beth Jacob v'Anshe Drildz Congregation, and Mekorot Institute of Torah Study.

But then, Levy said, Moses heard the word of God promising to carve two tablets the same as the first ones.

Levy, who earned her PhD in Tanach at Yeshiva University, is a teacher at Midreshet Moriah in Israel, and director of the graduate program in Tanach at Matan, the Sadie Rennert Women's Institute of Torah Studies.

She said that the second tablets could not, obviously, be the same as the first.

In fact, she said, they were greater. That is because they came down from Mount Sinai "when the Jewish people were penitent and remorseful," having gained the understanding that grandeur is fleeting.

The broken shards of the first set of tablets, she said, were not discarded. Rather, they were put in the Ark of the Covenant along with the new ones.

"Imagine the Israelites' realization of their loss [when Moses destroyed the tablets]. Imagine their insight into the consequences of their pursuit of vanity."

Not only the stones were broken, she said, "their collective hearts were broken."

By immediately preparing a new set of tablets, God "showed that he is prepared to forgive – to begin again. There is a road back."

Not only that, Levy said, but the words would be stronger than before.

When God initiated the covenant the first time, she said,"He inscribed it in letters of fire. Now he will inscribe them on the chambers of our hearts. We just need to open our hearts and let it in."

When Moses, in his farewell address to the people, described the events at Sinai after a span of 40 years, he described the "unity of purpose; the sights, the sounds, the covenant, the great gift of the two stone tablets [with the Ten Commandments]."

It was "the spiritual zenith for the people that turned into the greatest nightmare. Here the greatest spiritual leader on his way to deliver the word of God, saw the golden calf."

The question is how Moses could allow himself to destroy "tablets inscribed by God. Why not just return them? Why bring them down in the first place," she asked.

The commentaries have three explanations, she said. The first is that Moses deliberately broke them for the greater good of the people. Seeing the "travesty" of the people worshipping the calf so soon after the miracle of the Exodus and the parting of the Red Sea, he questioned whether they were able to accept the obligation, and thus the accountability, of following their precepts when they couldn't even handle it for 40 days.

On the other hand, another commentary suggested, perhaps he worried that since the people were already worshipping a graven image, they would see the tablets as an image too and worship them.

A second explanation for Moses' action was that indeed, he would not have done such a thing on his own – that God either knew and approved, or that He Himself had commanded it.

Finally, Maimonides, the Rambam, proposed that when Moses saw the golden calf, it completely sapped his physical and emotional strength, and the tablets slipped out of his arms.

The replacement of the tablets, Levy said, sent words of hope to the people that were later echoed in the Book of Jeremiah at the destruction of the First Temple, 'I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel...I will put my Torah in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts.'

Rabbi Maury Kelman, Ruth Kelman's youngest child, opened the evening by leading the audience in saying tehillim for the welfare of Israel.

He noted how much his mother would have savoured this kind of lecture, as she had been a great advocate of advanced Torah study for women.

The lecture was the first in a week-long series of lectures by Levy.

Judaism and medical ethics explored

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Should research findings gleaned from experiments on concentration camp victims be used? What about research carried out before World War II by those who were later involved in such horrific activities?

These were some of the questions posed during a session titled Confronting Evil in Medicine: An Ethical Response to the Use of Tainted Sources Based on Jewish Law and Tradition, part of an all-day symposium held at Baycrest's Wagman Centre on Controversies in Medical Ethics: Jewish Secular and Legal Perspectives.

William Seidelman, a physician at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and St. Michael's Hospital and a professor in the department of family and community medicine at the University of Toronto, has extensively studied the medical research done in the Nazi period.

'Physicians have both a divine mandate and an obligation to heal'

While Josef Mengele's experiments on twins are well known, there was also considerable attention paid to hypothermia (performed for the Luftwaffe, who were concerned about airmen who were shot down in inclement weather), genetic diseases, immunization and blood analysis.

Experimental subjects, Seidelman said, were psychiatric patients, prisoners (including concentration camp inmates) and children.

Specimens taken from these people, he said, were often sold to museums.

"Every doctor [in Nazi Germany] was involved either directly or indirectly in euthanasia, in deciding whose lives were or were not worth living."

Universities were also involved with euthanization and sterilization procedures.

The experiments, he said, were "all done by respected academics, researchers and institutions, such as the Kaiser Wilhelm Research Institutes in Berlin."

While a good deal of the research was just plain bad science, which precludes any discussion of ethics, some of it is in use.

One example Seidelman used was the Pernkopf Anatomy, said to be one of the best collections of anatomical drawings ever made. Eduard Pernkopf was dean of the University of Vienna medical faculty after Nazi Germany annexed Austria in 1938. A prominent member of the Nazi party, he dismissed all the Jewish faculty members.

Research in the 1990s determined that bodies of executed political prisoners had been delivered to the artists in the anatomy department, who then used the body parts as models for the anatomy book and as teaching materials.

Julius Hallervorden and Hans Reiter did highly respected research before the Nazi era, and their names are associated with diseases they worked on – Hallervorden-Spatz disease, a neurodegenerative genetic disease and Reiter's Syndrome, a form of arthritis that occurs after infection.

Later, under the Nazis, both were active and enthusiastic participants in medical experimentation and research. Reiter, for instance, studied typhus in concentration camp inmates.

Rabbi Nachum Berlat, director of pastoral care at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, said that physicians have both a divine mandate and an obligation to heal. In fact, a physician who refuses is culpable of bloodshed.

Along with the obligation to heal, however, are other obligations, including not to cause injury or give deadly potions.

While Rabbi Berlat acknowledged that German physicians have made many legitimate contributions to medical knowledge, such as the dangers of cigarette smoking and the importance of a healthy diet, during the Nazi years they "lost their ethical underpinnings. The question, then, is that if some of their findings are valid, can they still be used?"

The Halachah says that even if data is obtained in an illegal manner, such as during an autopsy, which, generally speaking, is not permitted according to Jewish law, it can be used, said Rabbi Berlat.

"Halachah teaches the concept of pikuach nefesh, the overriding obligation of saving a human life, even if the source of the knowledge is unacceptable."

He quoted the late Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik, who, on being taken to task for permitting a violation of Shabbbat for a mild illness, said that "he didn't take Shabbat lightly, he took pikuach nefesh seriously."

One suggestion as to what to do with research carried out by Nazified doctors has been simply to rename illnesses and studies that use names of Nazis. Reiter's syndrome, for instance, could be re-named "reactive arthritis." Seidelman and Rabbi Berlat acknowledge, however, that this is difficult to do because the names are widely used.

Their solution is to literally blot out the names. Whenever one of the names is written, a line should be drawn through it. Whenever they are cited in a footnote, a note should be added as to how the material was collected, and that the researchers had Nazi connections.

This proposal was based on the law in the Torah that says one must blot out the name of Amalek, a tribe that, without provocation, attacked the Israelites during their wandering in the desert. (The Nazis are considered to have succeeded Amalek.)

In this way, Seidelman explained, "their names are not removed, but they are forever stigmatized."

The symposium was sponsored by the Fay Florence Grobin Memorial Fund in co-operation with the University of Toronto Joint Centre for Bioethics.

Other topics covered included long- term, end-of-life and palliative care, resource allocation and discharge planning.

Historian one of first CJN fellows

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Claude Cohen Matlofsky, a local historian, has written what she claims is the first book about Jews in the Land of Israel during a pivotal phase of the Roman occupation.

The era she investigated begins in 40 BCE and ends in 135 CE. It encompasses two Jewish revolts against the Romans and the destruction of the Second Temple in Jerusalem.

Published in Paris last winter, her book, a spinoff of a PhD thesis, is entitled Les Laics en Palestine d'Auguste a Hadrien: etude prosopographique (The Lay People in Palestine from Augustus to Hadrian: a Prosopographic Study).

Claude Cohen Matlofsky

The volume focuses on the people who lived in Palestine during those years: Jews, Romans, pagans and early Christians.

The majority of the 715 names mentioned in the book are Jewish, said Matlofsky, a 42-year-old historian and one of the first Canadian Jewish News fellows at the University of Toronto in 1990.

The fellowships were funded by the late Ray Wolfe, a businessman and former publisher of the CJN.

During this period in question, Talmudic Judaism and Christianity developed, and the centre of Judaism shifted from Jerusalem to the Galilee.

In gathering her data, Matlofsky studied funerary inscriptions in Jerusalem and Jericho and the writings of ancient chroniclers.

As a result, she said, she was able to draw a fairly objective picture of life among ordinary folks in Palestine, whom historians usually overlook.

Matlofsky, who holds a doctorate from the University of Paris, studied their names, occupations and funerary customs.

"There is still a lot we don't know about that period," she said.

For example, there are gaps about the dietary customs and the degree of religious observance among the Jews of that time.

As a scholar, Matlofsky has been working on this era for at least 15 years, but her interest in it was intially piqued when she was a student in Paris.

Although she holds no academic position today, she is currently writing scholarly articles on Josephus Flavius, a Palestinian historian and soldier who resisted Roman rule and wrote The Jewish War, and Jewish funerary customs.

Now the mother of two young boys, Matlofsky was born in Tunis, the capital of Tunisia.

Her father, Joseph, was a high school math teacher in a French school. Her mother, Daisy Cattan, was a legal secretary whose boss was related to the Tunisian president's wife, Wasila Bourguiba.

Matlofsky was eight years old when anti-Jewish riots, touched off by the 1967 Six Day War, broke out in Tunis.

She remembers seeing burned out and looted Jewish shops and blood on a street. During the brief unrest, Matlofsky's mother's employer, a Muslim, invited the Cohens to ride out the storm his home.

In the summer of that year, the Cohens emigrated from Tunisia and settled in Paris. They haven't been back since, and do not have a single relative left in Tunisia.

Matlofsky lived in Jerusalem from 1980 to 1985, during which she taught history and geography at local high schools. In Israel, she met her husband, Gerald, a lawyer.

In Canada, she has taught history in an Ottawa high school and French as a second language at the University of Toronto's School of Continuing Studies.

But her passion remains ancient Palestine.

Associated honours couple for lifetime involvement

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Eva and Harold Dessen talk about the early years of Associated Hebrew Day Schools as if they were merely onlookers.

But throughout the school's history, the Dessens have been involved as parents, board members, teachers and volunteers.

In recognition of their years of service, the Dessens were presented with a Lifetime Achievement Award at Associated's recent annual general meeting.

In an interview with The CJN, the Dessens, now life members of the board, described the many people who worked to get the school off the ground.

In 1952, when Harold first became a board member, the school was basically an evening school.

"At the time, Dr. Levi Jacober was principal – there was the beginnings of a pre-school – but not much effort had been expended on developing a day school," Harold explained.

Jacober, who had given up an academic position at Oxford, was a visionary, Eva added. He took it on himself to knock on doors, pursuing parents and teachers until the day school got off the ground.

Initially, it was a volunteer effort with no budget, Harold said.

The first teacher was Sarah (Steinhauer) Rumack. After that, 90 percent of Associated's general studies teachers were retired educators from the public schools, Harold said.

"We didn't want to be radical. We were in no position to experiment with teachers."

On the Hebrew side of the program, however, the emphasis was mainly on curriculum.

"A lot of the Hebrew teachers weren't trained to teach, but they were definitely scholars in Judaica," Harold said.

Jacober wanted an elite school which would make a mark on the community. In pursuit of that goal, he would interview every single child to see if they could tolerate a double curriculum.

"Sometimes, that objective pushed students away."

Eva, who has a PhD in Near Eastern Studies, taught at Associated, the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, the University of Toronto and York University. She said that among the first goals and principles the founders developed was that all children would study Hebrew studies in the Hebrew language.

The administration understood the importance of language as a cornerstone of national identity. In addition, they emphasized a Zionist curriculum.

The third principle was that the school would be traditional, with no religious, ideological or national labels.

"Even in cases where children weren't Jewish halachically, we would try to overcome the problem by delicately convincing parents to pursue halachic conversions.

"We were successful in almost every case," Harold said.

Another school policy was to hire teachers from Israel when qualified teachers couldn't be found.

"To save money, the school would look for an Israeli couple."

Around 1957, when Associated first began its junior high there were only three students, Harold said.

"Although it was extremely discouraging, they decided to go ahead with it."

Jack Burke was taken out of the classroom and given the opportunity to run a junior high school, he said.

"The second year he was able to get a regular class."

At a later stage, the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto had similar problems attracting students.

"We had to persuade our own daughter to attend CHAT," Harold said. The Dessens' two daughters, Serena and Susan, are graduates of Associated and CHAT. Their grandchildren currently attend Associated.

In the high school's early years, "there was a lot of creative accounting done by Associated to make sure that CHAT wouldn't show a deficit," Harold said.

The role of the volunteers has also evolved. From its early role as a welfare agency, the PTA has become a provider of educational necessities, Eva said.

Over the years, the school has changed. But it will continue to have a positive effect as long as the needs of the community are served, Harold said.

"As the school progressed and became successful, funding became a big issue," he noted.

"Now we're losing a lot of middle-income people who choose not to pursue Jewish education because they don't want to face a subsidy committee," Eva said.

Harold, who is an accountant, said that hopefully the Ontario tax credits will help alleviate some of this problem.

Hadassah-WIZO gets new head

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — To Beverley Crackower, newly installed president of Toronto Hadassah-WIZO, running the organization is like running a business with 3,000 employees.

"Thankfully, I have a great executive and wonderful officers who are all competent and eager to work. It will be an easy 'business' to run."

Beverley Crackower

Hadassah-WIZO, the largest women's Zionist organization in Canada, is dedicated to the health, social welfare and education of women and children in Israel as well as enrichment of Jewish life in Canada. Local programs focus on such things as women's health, legal issues and political affairs.

Crackower, 53, a native of London, Ont., grew up immersed in Jewishness and volunteerism. "My mother is a life member of Hadassah-WIZO and I always helped out at the annual bazaar. We lived in a small community, so everyone was involved."

She joined Hadassah-WIZO in Toronto when she was first married. "It wasn't just the volunteerism I enjoyed, it was the wonderful friends I made. After 27 years, I still belong to Gila chapter, along with past Toronto presidents Carol Lou Spiegel and Sharon Kroft.

"We all joined at the same time, and we felt the same driving force. We have a love for the organization."

There are are 52 chapters in the GTA, made up of women ranging from young mothers to seniors. "Members of one special chapter are now celebrating 55 years together. It is undoubtedly because of the connection they feel to each other, to the organization, to the community, and to Israel," says Crackower.

"There are 85- and 90-year-old women who still attend the Hadassah Bazaar, now in its 77th year," she says.

Her goals for her two-year term, says Crackower, are to keep membership growing and to carry on fundraising for Israel and Toronto.

"Proceeds from one of our fundraising projects, Heart to Heart, are earmarked for Sunnybrook and Women's College Hospital. It is a nice connection. It shows the community that we do work here as well as in Israel."

The organization also raises money for a North York women's shelter, and sponsors educational programs on women's issues.

Performing volunteer work has tremendous benefits, says Crackower. "It gives people a sense of togetherness, and provides leadership skills. Members learn to run meetings, keep budgets and delegate work. These are all skills that can be taken into the workforce."

Russia's chief rabbi visits Toronto

Rabbi Lazar – who has been accused of linking the Jewish community's fortunes too closely to the Russian president – believes Putin's rise to power has enhanced the stature of the Jewish community in Russia. In September 2000, Putin attended the opening of a seven-storey community centre in Moscow, and last winter he participated in a Chanukah candlelighting ceremony – both events that were widely reported across the country. The Russian state no longer supports anti-Semitism – though it still is a common phenomenon on the street – and the public perception of Israel has improved, largely due to a shared experience with terrorism, Rabbi Lazar said.

Jewish life, meanwhile, is enjoying a rebirth in the former Soviet Union (FSU), Rabbi Lazar said. Jewish schools are present in 54 FSU cities with enrolment exceeding 12,000 students. Despite state-sponsored harassment of Jewish life under the Communists, "it's a great miracle that Yiddishkeit survived," he said.

With an estimated 600,000 Jews remaining in Russia following the mass emigration of the last decade, he believes "we should help those who stay live as Jews."

Rabbi Lazar has been following that credo since 1987, shortly after Mikhail Gorbachev opened Russia under perestroika and glasnost.

Born and educated in Milan, Rabbi Lazar, 37, was one of the first Lubavitch representatives to move to Russia to set up religious classes – at first for only 17 students..

Rabbi Lazar, who enjoys dual U.S. and Russian citizenship, was elected chief rabbi of Russia in June 2000 by 26 rabbis and the Federation of Jewish Communities in Russia, a Lubavitch organization.

As chief rabbi, Rabbi Lazar is recognized by the government as the Jewish community's official representative.

His election, however, was not without controversy. Rabbi Shayevich accused the government of seeking his ouster and he claimed Lubavitch had pressured him to resign. He told JTA that Lubavitch representatives offered him $1,500 a month if he were to give up his pulpit at Moscow's prestigious Choral Synagogue.

Rabbi Lazar's election also appears linked to internal Russian politics. Rabbi Shayevich had been supported by the Russian Jewish Congress (RJC) when it was headed by Vladimir Goussinsky, a media baron who ran afoul of Putin for supporting his political rivals and for criticizing the war in Chechnya. Goussinsky has been charged with fraud and embezzlement and saw his media holdings expropriated. He now lives in Spain and his replacement as head of the RJC is financial magnate Leonid Nevzlin, considered a close friend of Putin.

That led to accusations that the federation was being supported by "Berezovsky's people" in the Kremlin, a charge that Rabbi Lazar and the federation denied.

Rabbi Shayevich has accused Rabbi Lazar of splitting Russian Jewry, and Rabbi Shayevich also sent Putin a letter asking that he not interfere in the internal affairs of the Jewish community.

For his part, Rabbi Lazar asserted that Rabbi Shayevich had been installed by the KGB – a view shared by other Jews in Russia – and was limited in what he could do for Russian Jews: "He had to go between the drops," and he "did as much as he could… To say such a person should serve the Jewish community does not fit the situation today," Rabbi Lazar said.

Meanwhile, Pavel Feldblum, executive director of the Moscow Jewish community, said Rabbi Lazar can only be considered chief rabbi of Lubavitch in Russia. The Conference of European Rabbis said it would continue to recognize Rabbi Shayevich as chief rabbi, and Rabbi Lazar came under stinging attack in North America from Rabbi Ammiel Hirsch, executive director of ARZA, the Reform movement's Zionist arm.

In an "alert" posted on the ARZA Web site, Rabbi Hirsch writes: "We have become increasingly concerned with Chabad Lubavitch's divisive activities in Russia...Many supporters of Russian Jewry are beginning to feel they are losing the struggle to define Russian Judaism broadly in a manner that embraces all elements of the Jewish community."

He criticized Rabbi Lazar for sending a mass mail appeal to tens of thousands of American Jews, without indicating that the recipient of the funds is the Lubavitch movement.

חרפורמים וארץ ישראל-מה רוצים מחס

באותו עניין

"יש יפות ממנה, אך אין יפה כמוה."

ישראל נגד ספרד... בסורנסו יורק פיינקר

Argentinian mission met with enthusiasm

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The relationship between the Jewish communities in Winnipeg and Buenos Aires is "an ideal shidduch," says Evelyn Hecht, director of community relations for the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg.

Hecht, who was a member of a delegation from Winnipeg that met last month with members of the Argentinian Jewish community, said in a recent interview with The CJN that both communities have the same roots, much the same profile and share a high degree of volunteerism.

The delegation met individually with 49 families in Buenos Aires – the meetings had been prescheduled – and gave seminars, by invitation only, to another 150 people. The majority of the people they saw, Hecht says, were professional – accountants, psychologists, business administration graduates, architects, lawyers with young families. Some were newlyweds.

The other delegates were Bob Freedman, executive director of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg; Deb Zehr, who works in the provincial government's department of immigration, promotion and recruitment; Jim Carr, executive director of the Manitoba Business Council; and Monica Schor, an Argentinian Jewish immigrant to Winnipeg, to serve as a translator.

"We went there hoping to find a number of Jewish families who would be interested in coming to Winnipeg," Hecht says. "We were very gratified with the response.

"Having Monica with us was a tremendous asset. Most of the people we met spoke some English, but it was easier for them to be able to speak to someone in their native tongue. And Monica did her homework."

It was Schor's first trip back to Argentina since she immigrated to Winnipeg four years ago with her husband, Eduardo, and their two now teenaged children.

"We had been considering leaving for a long time," Schor said in a separate interview.

"There weren't many jobs where we were living in Tierra del Fuego. We wanted to give our children a better future," says Schor, who works in the Manitoba liquor commission's computer department.

The Schors were considering trying to get to Toronto when they heard about an earlier delegation from the Winnipeg Jewish community visiting Buenos Aires.

"We are happy we chose to come to Winnipeg," Schor says. "We don't need to live in a big city. Winnipeg has everything we need."

Argentina's Jewish population, most of whom live in Buenos Aires, stands at about 190,000. That figure has fallen from about 250,000 20 years ago. The Winnipeg Jewish community's Arentinian initiative began in the mid-1990s through a chance encounter on a plane between a Jewish Argentinian and Janice Filmon, whose husband, Gary, was premier of Manitoba at the time.

As a result of three previous visits by Winnipeg Jewish community leaders, 17 Argentinian Jewish families have settled in Winnipeg. One family returned to Argentina and five have left for other parts of Canada for employment or educational reasons.

"No one left because they didn't like Winnipeg or the weather," Hecht points out.

This most recent trip was different, she says, in that it was informational rather than promotional. A lot of South American Jews already know about Winnipeg as a result of the community's Web site which has a Spanish-language page. The people the Winnipeggers met have already made the decision to leave Argentina, Hecht says.

"We were as honest and open as we could be," Hecht says. "We told them about the immigration system – which can take up to a year to process new immigrants – and warned them that it can take up to six months to find that first real job. We spoke about our Jewish community and what we have to offer.

"Our government representative was very impressed by the calibre of the prospective immigrants we met with."

Domestic abuse among Jews explored

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG – Research shows that Jewish women suffer domestic abuse at the same rate as non-Jewish women and that abuse cuts across religious denominations and economic classes, says Elaine Weiss, a clinical associate professor at the University of Utah school of medicine and author of Surviving Domestic Violence: Voices of Women Who Broke Free.

Health & Lifestyles

Weiss was invited by the Jewish Child and Family Service (JCFS) to educate the community about the scope of domestic abuse.

She sat for a radio station interview, addressed the Jewish community, spoke to high school students at Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate and was the keynote speaker at the JCFS annual general meeting.

Domestic abuse, Weiss says, is not about anger, but rather power and control. It speaks to the lack of self-worth in the abuser. While we may associate it mainly with physical violence, it takes other forms as well, such as constant criticism, public humiliation, control of the purse strings and blame for everything.

"It takes a woman, on average, eight years to leave an abusive spouse," Weiss says. "Jewish women and religious women stay longer."

Weiss speaks from experience; she was in an abusive relationship for eight years. She came from a loving home and married a Jewish man she had dated for two years. Before they married, he came across as a nice, smart and warm individual.

Potential abusers are not easy to spot in advance, Weiss observes, because they are on their best behaviour during the courtship.

"The abuse started the summer after we married, for no reason I could understand," she says.

That abuse included some physical violence combined with a concerted attack on her sense of self-worth.

"I tried hard to make my marriage work," she says. "I thought it was my fault, that I was doing something wrong. My husband convinced me that I couldn't do anything right."

She and her husband, by then a prominent corporate lawyer, went for psychiatric counselling for two years only to have the psychiatrist confirm that it was her fault for being a "Jewish American Princess."

The turning point came one day when she and her husband were walking in New York. At a crosswalk, she commented on how attractive a certain building looked. He, as usual, began putting her down. Another woman at the crosswalk turned to him, told him that his wife was right and called him a jackass. Then the lady crossed the street and continued on her way.

"We stood there silently," Weiss recalls. "That lady changed my life. I left him the next winter. I had started graduate school and had professors telling me I was smart. I made new friends. On my 27th birthday, I told him it was over. He cried and begged and promised to change.

"I moved into my own apartment and went on with life. I earned a doctorate, built a business and remarried. Neil and I just celebrated our 23rd anniversary."

She acknowledges that she was lucky that her first husband never threatened her or stalked her.

"My story is not unusual," she says. "Since my book has come out, I have received thousands of letters, all much the same story. The bad news is that so many women are being victimized. The good news is that the Jewish community is finally breaking the silence. We have to send a message to abusers that what they are doing is not acceptable and will no longer be tolerated."

Subtle signs of impending change

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Veteran political watchers will tell you, more often than not, one can begin to get hints that changes to the political landscape are coming by subtle signs rather than by major governmental announcements.

In the absence of the drama of the daily question period, we are left to study those subtleties to anticipate the next developments on a number of fronts.

On the leadership front, we can observe a couple of interesting things. First and perhaps most significant, rumour has it that Paul Martin is getting a bit nervous. Over the last few months, while Sheila Copps has been distributing flags, Brian Tobin shipping contracts and Alan Rock remedies to the healthcare crises, the finance minister has been relegated to offering defensive assurances about the state of the economy. Martin's concern is confirmed by his quiet decision to "reorganize" his staff in favour of a more aggressive approach. All of this suggests a much closer leadership race than was first anticipated. The thing to watch for now is who among the contenders manages to attract media attention during the listless days of the summer.

On the other side of the House, the leadership issue is burning as hot as the weather. Diane Ablonczy's and Deb Grey's decision to accept positions within the caucus strike a blow to the anti-Day rebels. Much of the anti-Day momentum is now spent and riding associations across the country will think twice before voting to dump Day.

The biggest loser out of all of this – and the one who is most responsible for the Grey/Ablonczy "rethink" is Joe Clark. By overplaying his card with a smugness that belied his paltry 12 seats in the House, Clark reminded all CA/Reform supporters of the reasons they left the Tories in the first place. This explains Clark's complete invisibility over the past three weeks and the renewed interest on the part of individuals like Peter MacKay in seriously exploring with Day's people initiatives like joint candidates.

If we see Day pick up a couple of impressive endorsements over the summer months, then we'll know that he has securely regained control over the party. If not, we can expect a painful time ahead for the Alliance and all other forces that dream of replacing the ruling Liberals.

Speaking of summer months, your "assignment" is to attend as many MP barbecues as possible and make your presence felt.

Meeting in the middle at the Cedars

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

WATERLOO — Halfway through my visit to Temple Shalom, I notice all four of my guides are wearing sandals.

It's a warm spring day, but all of them?

Feature

In a way, though, sandals are perfect. Their congregation wandered for over 35 years, coming home only five years ago, with Westminster United Church, to the world's first shared Jewish-Christian worship space: the Cedars Worship Centre.

A liberal outpost in a two-shul town, Temple Shalom's congregants longed for their own home, but with under 70 families, couldn't afford to build. When one congregant suggested building with Westminster, they leapt in.

At the Cedars, double doors from a shared lobby lead into an hourglass-shaped auditorium – an inequal hourglass; Temple Shalom is about half Westminster's size.

"The relationship's not a symmetrical one," says Bob Chodos, a former president. "In terms of the design of the sanctuary, it wasn't an easy thing to work out."

The spaces stand back-to-back, separated by a folding wall. Movable wooden benches face the "front" of each space. A woodwind ensemble rehearses throughout my visit, the music soaring among vaulted pale-wood ceilings and pink cinderblock. I linger, wandering over to the shared bookshelf to see what Cedars people are reading.

The books mirror what Westminster's pamphlet calls "two unabashedly different groups." A children's book by Harold Kushner lies with The Friendly Beasts, featuring the refrain "Jesus, our brother, kind and good." A bile-green 1970 volume dryly offering Hebrew Through Values is pushed aside by Really Bad Girls of the Bible.

A suitable statement of the liberal bent of both congregations.

Without those beliefs, Temple Shalom congregants say, the two groups couldn't have collaborated.

"We're more open to that kind of thing," says Jennifer Shalinsky.

Chodos agrees. "We're out in the world with non-Jews, living, working with them."

Roz Adelberg, a founding member, adds, "Our best friends are non-Jews. We're comfortable with them."

Boratto's denomination, the United Church, already known for its acceptance of Judaism, issued a statement in 1997 called "Bearing Faithful Witness," which emphasizes that Jesus isn't the Jewish messiah. It condemns deceptive conversion, and urges compromises like saying "Hebrew scriptures" instead of "Old Testament."

At the Cedars, compromise is no abstract concept. Temple Shalom recently opened a tiny Judaica shop; at first, the wooden display case seems typical, offering intricate havdalah candles and Rosh Hashanah cards. But another look reveals that the right side of the case holds olive wood crosses from Jerusalem. Many Jews would squirm to see such objects together.

Of course, compromises cut both ways. There's no permanent cross in the sanctuary; a child carries one in during services.

The cross's absence eases Jewish concerns about meeting in a church, and also eliminates potential conflict for Christians.

Even by Jewish standards, Temple Shalom is austere, from its hard wooden pews to the concrete floor. But a vast window overlooks a garden Shalinsky tends herself, and with the parochet revealed, majestic ark doors in steel and handmade paper by Toronto artist Temma Gentles, the effect is inspiring. With sunlight streaming in, the vast ceilings, and the wind ensemble picking its way through Mozart, it's easy to fall in love with this little shul.

Temple Shalom has had its share of problems, like their first and only contract rabbi, who lasted less than a year. Yet even that ended well, inspiring the congregants to hire student rabbis instead.

"We've been so happy with that decision," says Adelberg.

"They've all been wonderful," Shalinsky says.

And all different, her husband Bill says. Without the big-city variety of synagogues and adult education programs, the student rabbis have broadened the congregants' Jewish experience.

For a while, congregants, too, were coming and going, leaving Waterloo for other communities. But now, university faculty are seeking tenure and building families. Adelberg recalls driving her son to Toronto for bar mitzvah lessons – "he's 45, so you figure it out!" She marvels that this June, Temple Shalom celebrated four bnei mitzvot – one each Shabbat.

Adelberg stands with Boratto in the lobby, as he points out two Jerusalem stones, "one brought back by a member of each congregation."

"Almost everybody here is from somewhere else," Chodos says, but like those stones, this place has brought them together. Sandals or not, Temple Shalom's nomadic days are over – through hard work and compromise, they've come home to the Cedars.

Hebrew University launches major fund-raising campaign

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Hebrew University, Israel's flagship institution of higher learning, has launched a massive multi-million dollar fund-raising campaign to ensure that it remains on the cutting edge of innovation.

Over the next three to four years, the university hopes to raise some $400 million (U.S.) for new buildings and facilities.

It is also revitalizing its academic programs, said Menachem Magidor, the president, in an interview last week.

Magidor, a mathematician who has headed the Hebrew University since 1997 and was recently appointed to a second four-year term, was here to attend a dinner honouring Canadian business tycoon Israel Asper. The event was sponsored by Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University.

Asper, the proprietor of a burgeoning media empire, donated $5 million to build the Asper Centre for Entrepreneurship at the Hebrew University's school of business.

The university, which marked its 75th aniversary last year, launched a $1 billion drive in 1997. To date, $636 million has been raised in pledges and outright gifts, leaving a gap of about $400 million to fill.

"These funds will guarantee the future of the Hebrew University in terms of programs and buildings," explained Magidor, a visiting professor at the University of Toronto 10 years ago.

In line with its goal of keeping pace with the times, the university has opened a school of engineering, plans to inaugurate a school of public policy and an institute of plant science and intends to restructure its Jewish studies program.

The school of engineering, which admitted its first class in 2000, is designed to train a fresh cadre of leaders for Israel's increasingly important high-tech sector.

Computer engineering and bio-engineering are among the subjects offered.

"We are not competing with the Technion," said Magidor, referring to Israel's premiere school of technology.

The school of public policy, scheduled to begin operations next year, will be geared to graduate students.

Offering a rationale for its existence, Magidor said, "The way policy decisions are taken in Israel leaves something to be desired."

The institute of plant science will offer a more global and integrative approach to agricultural sciences than is the case today.

By the same token, the restructuring of the Jewish studies program is meant to give students a broader perspective.

"For example, we'll study the social implications of the interaction between Jewish and non-Jewish culture."

Magidor, a sabra born in Petach Tikvah in 1946, compared the university to a tree.

"Israel should be rooted in its heritage, but open to change. It's like a tree, rooted in its own soil but with its branches open to the world."

As the curriculum is reshaped to meet changing demands and challenges, the university will construct buildings for the school of engineering, the school of business, the institute of plant science and the Jewish studies program.

And it will erect additional student dorms and sports facilities.

In the past 30 years, enrolment has doubled to 22,000, of whom 13,000 are undergraduates.

"We're the most non-local university in Israel," said Magidor. "Seventy-five percent of our students come from outside of Jerusalem."

Among them are 2,000 Israeli Arabs and 70 Palestinians from the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Although the Palestinian uprising has not affected student life on campus, apart from shouting matches, the intifadah will have a marked impact on enrolment at the Rothberg International School, which caters mainly to English speakers from abroad.

Hebrew University president Menachem Magidor

Projections indicate that far fewer foreign students, particularly Americans, will enrol at the Rothberg International School in the 2002 session.

Normally, 800 to 900 Americans sign up for the one-year program, which attracts a total of about 1,100 undergrads.

Next year, however, only 200 to 300 undergrads from the United States are expected to show up.

Magidor does not anticipate a startling downturn in Canadian enrolment.

Speaking of the university's importance to Jerusalem, Magidor said it is the city's second largest employer after the government.

"We employ 4,000 full-time faculty and staff," he said. "We issue an average of 12,000 pay checks per month."

Currently, the university, in cooperation with the municipality, is building a technological park for start-up companies.

It will be ready for occupancy in three years.

"The Hebrew University is an important resource for Israel's high-tech industry," he said.

Apart from helping Jerusalem economically, the university attracts young people to the city and thus widens its demographic base.

"If Jerusalem becomes a poor city, divided between haredim and Arabs, Israelis will lose interest in it."

Magidor manages an annual budget of $500 million, of which $150 million is earmarked for research.

Of its $350 million regular budget, 70 percent is derived from government subsidies, 15 percent from tuition, seven percent from gifts and eight percent from royalties and real estate.

"We live on a tight budget, but we manage," he said.

However, the situation maychange for the worse in the future, Magidor warned.

"The government is talking about budget cuts, and we don't know whether we'll be compensated for cuts in tuition, which go into effect next year."

Argentine Jews tell of misery

By MICHAEL J. JORDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — If it can happen in Argentina, it can happen anywhere.

So say American-Jewish activists and Argentine-Jewish expatriates of the economic and spiritual crisis afflicting Argentine Jewry.

"Ten years ago, if you had asked me which Jewish community in the world most mirrors the American-Jewish community, I would have said the Argentinian Jews," said Will Recant, assistant executive vice-president of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), speaking recently as part of a panel at Congregation B'nai Jeshrun in Manhattan.

"If you had told me that today we'd be providing Argentinian Jews with relief aid and food packages, I never would have believed you."

Yet today, Argentina suffers from economic collapse and hardship that some compare to Depression-era America. Coupled with the failure of two Jewish-owned banks, it has spawned legions of "new-poor" Jews and has devastated a community of approximately 220,000 that once was among the Diaspora's most vibrant, Recant said.

Argentine Jewry's traditional pool of roughly 4,000 welfare cases has grown to some 25,000. In all, about 10 percent of the community is said to be living beneath the poverty line, drawn at $12,000 a year for a family of four.

All this comes on top of twin terror attacks – against the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires, which killed 29 in 1992; and against the main communal institution, AMIA, which in 1994 killed 86 people, including much of the community's leadership.

No one has been prosecuted for either bombing, though a trial is said to be expected within months.

The community is shaken and, several years later, still feels vulnerable. Physical barriers and armed guards now protect virtually every Jewish institution.

"The trauma this community has suffered is tremendous," Recant told the shul's Latin America Committee.

He was joined on the panel by Rabbi Alfredo Borodowski, who moved from Argentina to the United States 11 years ago, and Stewart Cahn, a New York lay leader of Argentine-Jewish descent.

When Rabbi Borodowski returned recently to the Buenos Aires seminary where he studied for the rabbinate, he said he found the elevator dormant and the building lit by a bare bulb, as the seminary couldn't afford to pay its electricity bills.

The activity rooms at his synagogue, where he used to play, have been transformed into areas where food, medicine and clothing are dispensed.

"The idea that in Argentina Jews would have to go to the synagogue for food," Rabbi Borodowski said, is "beyond dreams – it's [a] nightmare."

He said his brother lost his entire $16,000 in savings, which he had held in one of the Jewish-owned banks. He now lives in a sparsely furnished apartment that "I don't know how he pays for."

His parents are in worse shape.

"I couldn't have conceived that my mom and dad – two professionals – would ever have accepted money from their son in the United States. And if they're accepting it, then that means they're not telling me 10 percent of what's really going on," he said.

Much of the Argentine community traces its roots to east European immigrants who, plagued by pogroms and economic misery, set sail for the New World a century ago.

"They went to Argentina for a sense of security," said Cahn, whose grandfather emigrated from Belarus, "and that sense of security is not there anymore."

Over the decades, they established themselves as one of the nation's most affluent communities. The older generation was primarily involved in mom-and-pop businesses – shops, pharmacies and furriers – while the younger generation embraced higher education and entered the professions.

Argentine Jews are a tight-knit group with a vast network of Jewish institutions, community centers, synagogues, day schools and Zionist camps.

But the network today is in disarray, and its congregations, sports clubs and other organizations are fast losing members.

The economic crisis is further exacerbated by a machismo that Jews have adopted from the greater Argentine society, panelists said.

"If you're a man, you don't want to admit that 'I lost my job, I can't afford it, can I have a scholarship for my kids?'" Recant said.

"It's just not the way it's done in a macho culture. So families are just dropping out."

As always, the elderly are hardest hit. The average pension is $150 per month, while the JDC estimates that an individual needs $400 per month to survive.

With their welfare net torn apart, Jews are forced to continue working into their 70s to eke out an existence.

Yet some of the troubles, it turns out, may have been self-inflicted.

According to Argentine Jewish expatriates in the audience, the Jewish leadership in the country is entrenched and incompetent.

Nasrallah to Japanese envoy: 'IDF prisoners are being treated well'

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — "Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah told me that the four kidnapped Israelis 'were being well treated,'" said Japan's ambassador to Beirut, Nauto Amaki, in an interview published last week in the Lebanese daily, Al-Mustaqbal.

The ambassador said, however, that in his meeting with Nasrallah, he had not been told outright that the three Israel Defence Forces soldiers and one civilian, in the captivity of the radical Shi'ite organization since last October, were indeed alive.

Amaki said that he had met with Nasrallah together with the visiting director-general of the Japanese foreign ministry.

"We discussed the subject of the prisoners and Nasrallah made it clear that from a humanitarian point of view, this issue has already been determined. We [Japan] offered to assist in solving the problem of the exchange of prisoners, because this would greatly help to defuse the crisis situation that exists in the area. We had a good and constructive talk with the general secretary, and at its conclusion, he clarified that the four Israeli prisoners are being treated well, as if they were members of Hezbollah, and even better."

This was the first meeting between Nasrallah and the Japanese ambassador, who was appointed to his post in Beirut this year. Japanese diplomatic sources refused last week to comment on the ambassador's statements.

Despite the meeting, Japan is not involved in the negotiations concerning the four kidnapped Israelis. Efforts have so far been carried out primarily by German envoys.

To date, Israel has received no concrete evidence that the four are indeed alive – a prerequisite stipulated by Israel before it is willing to begin negotiations that would lead to an exchange of prisoners.

French Jewry demonstrate against Assad least publish an official response to Assad's remarks. However, he declined to specify when the response would be published or what exactly it would say. French Jewish leaders said that Vedrine was very vague on this point.

The main demonstration, in Paris, was attended by representatives of every political party in France – a rare gesture of solidarity with the Jews on the part of the French political establishment. The French Catholic Church also sent a representative to the Paris demonstration, and local bishops attended the demonstrations in other cities.

"The French church has taken a brave stand in comparison to the Vatican [which declined to denounce Assad's remarks]," Musicant said.

Other protests included one last Tuesday, at a reception for Assad organized by the Paris municipality. Three city council members got up, waved signs denouncing him and shouted slogans.

During his three-day visit, Assad urged France and the European Union as a whole to step up its involvement in the Middle East. According to the London-based Arabic newspaper Al-Hayat, Assad brought two principal messages to Paris: that Syria is committed to peace and economic reform, and that hard-liners within the Syrian government have accepted these policies. Assad also told French television that he wants to make peace with Israel.

French officials, for their part, said they would press Assad to "contribute to regional stability" by clamping down on extremist Islamic groups such as Hezbollah. On the whole, however, Assad is currently in France's good graces because of the recent withdrawal of Syrian troops from Beirut. Assad moved to defuse the anti-Semitism charge by insisting, in recent interviews with two French television stations and the paper Le Figaro, that his remarks in Damascus were misunderstood and that he never intended to offend the Jews.

France and Syria were scheduled to sign a number of economic and scientific agreements. The French foreign ministry, in an official statement issued prior to the visit, said it is interested in closer ties with Syria.

Syrian President Bashar Assad marked the end of his visit to Paris with a press conference, in which he stated that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon "is pushing the region" into further conflict.

"Syria does not want war, and nor do the other Arab nations," Assad said, "[but] Israel's behaviour is leading us in the direction of war."

Assad's remarks essentially reprised his address to French legislators last Tuesday, in which he said that the situation in the Middle East today was worse than it was a decade ago, before the Madrid conference kicked off the peace process.

Assad blamed the failure of the peace process on what he termed "Israel's non-compliance" with UN resolutions calling for it to withdraw from Arab territory. The Syrian leader said he had not yet met a single Western diplomat who could tell him that Sharon was interested in peace. Syria, in contrast, still longed for peace, he said.

"Syria has no conditions except the implementation of UN Security Council resolutions," he added.

In response to Assad's statement that he would be prepared to negotiate with Sharon, the Israeli prime minister said last Wednesday in Washington that he would be willing to meet with Assad and "negotiate with him without preconditions."

Sharon added, however, that it was not possible to start negotiations on the terms on which Syria had traditionally insisted – namely, that Israel agree to its territorial demands before the talks even begin.

Sharon also said that Syria was not discussed during his meeting with U.S. President George Bush last Tuesday.

Rabbi Ovadia's dream creates messianic buzz

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A recent dream reported by Shas spiritual leader Rabbi Ovadia Yosef has sent a messianic buzz through the haredi community. Sources close to the rabbi said that after prayers on Saturday morning two weeks ago, Rabbi Yosef told his son, Moshe, and Minister Eli Yishai that he had dreamed about the Messiah the night before.

The rabbi reportedly asked them not to divulge any news of his nighttime vision.

Then, at a wedding of a grandchild on Monday, Rabbi Yosef told guests: "In a dream on Friday night, I saw the Messiah coming to the Western Wall. There were many people at the Wall plaza. The [Messiah] told them: 'I have come because there are a million pupils who study at secular schools and do not learn Torah. I want all religious scholars to mobilize… to teach them Torah. There shouldn't be a single school without Torah.

"I heard this all in a dream, and then I woke up," the rabbi told the guests.

Ashkenazi haredi sources said yesterday that this was the first time that Rabbi Yosef, who is viewed as a leading authority on religious law and does not usually delve into mystical matters, had spoken about dreams, the Messiah and redemption.

Members of Shas said that in view of the strong emotions stirred by Rabbi Yosef's dream, a discussion on the matter was to be held next Sunday at a yeshiva in Jerusalem's Geula neighbourhood.

The Airline of the Jewish People

According to Reports

Conventional wisdom vs. empirical evidence

Recently, this column drew attention to the persistent way some journalists report the Palestinian claims of what their current uprising is about as if they were facts. The claim, for example, that the violence is about "establishing a Palestinian state" should not be reported as fact since Palestinians could have achieved statehood through negotiations but rejected it under Arafat's leadership. In actuality, the uprising is about destabilizing the region and drawing Israel into massive retaliation that will result in the "internationalization" of the conflict.

For some, particularly political moderates, the violence may even be about Arafat's wanting, by refusing to put an "end to the conflict," to destroy Israel, even if in the near future he cannot do so in a physical sense.

Several items in the Israeli media have recently appeared on this subject. In "What the Palestinians think" (Ha'aretz, June 27), Ze'ev Schiff referred to a survey of Palestinian public opinion conducted this month by Ghassan Khatib's Jerusalem Media & Communications Center (JMCC). It found that 79 percent continue to support the "intifadah" and that almost 69 percent support suicide attacks against Israelis (compared to 26 percent in March 1999). Schiff notes: "These figures naturally reflect a high level of frustration among Palestinians, who now believe that only the use of force will enable them to achieve national goals."

But what are these "national goals"? The JMCC results that were "most troubling" to Schiff confirmed what a great many Israelis fear: only 45.6 percent said that the campaign is about ending "the Israeli occupation" and establishing a Palestinian state based on UN Security Council Resolution 242. Nearly the same number, 41.2 percent, said that the goal was the "total liberation of Palestinian land," which means, as Schiff observes, Israel's destruction. (Only 9.2 percent consider the uprising's aim to be a tactic for improving negotiation conditions).

Journalists, especially those who've recently drawn a lot of attention to Israeli settlement activity as a major "cause" of Palestinian violence, should also consider another finding of the JMCC poll: 67.1 percent rejected ending the uprising in return for "ending Jewish settlement." Only 25.1 percent approved.

This empirical evidence should be a strong antidote to the persistence of conventional wisdom. But rarely are things so straightforward, not only within Western journalistic circles, but also among some Israelis who insist on remaining "incorrigible optimists" (in the words of Meron Benvenisti).

For example, when Yossi Beilin was recently asked in an interview with Ari Shavit (Ha'aretz, June 14), "Do you really think [Arafat] will accept the existence of a Jewish state inside the Green Line?", he evaded a direct reply, saying, "That's not the question." But of course it is. It's the question everyone should be asking. When Beilin then argued that "a Palestinian state is the life-belt of the Jewish state," he needed to consider whether, assuming this is correct, it is something the Palestinians – particularly Arafat – want for that very reason. Finally, when Shavit persisted: "Still, are you really sure that the Palestinian national movement in general and Yasser Arafat in particular, accept deep down the idea of two states for two peoples?" even Beilin admitted: "Deep down, I don't know."

June 25

• British Prime Minister Tony Blair "showed a lot of understanding for Israel's situation" when he met Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, according to a spokesperson for the Israeli Embassy in London.

• Israel arrested two more Palestinians it said were involved in the brutal lynching of two IDF soldiers in October in Ramallah.

June 26

• Sharon told U.S. President George W. Bush during a White House visit that all violence must stop before Israel resumes negotiations with the Palestinians.

• A third compound opened in Gondar, Ethiopia, for the roughly 10,000 Ethiopians gathered there awaiting the chance to emigrate to Israel.

June 27

• The Municipality of Jerusalem is planning to lower the Western Wall Plaza by almost six metres in order to uncover lower portions of the Western Wall and create a more impressive structure. The plan reportedly, will cost $25 million (US).

• Haifa University named Manfred Lahnstein, a former German finance minister, to head the university. Lahnstein is believed to be the first non-Jew and German to achieve such a post in Israel.

June 28

• Katya Weintraub, 27, was killed and another Israeli woman was wounded yesterday evening in an ambush by Palestinian gunmen north of Jenin. The Palestinians, waiting in a car by the side of the road, opened fire at the women's two-car convoy as it headed toward Israel.

June 29

Business Profile

Peter Beck: To the swift go the day trades

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

On thousands of computer screens across North America, parallel coloured bars move up and down in reciprocal motion, like pistons in a two-stroke engine.

When the bar on the right is dropping, the bar on the left is rising. When the bar on the right is rising, the one on the left is dropping.

A simple enough process. Now go out and make $200,000 using that information.

At the Toronto offices of Swift Trade, day traders are glued to their monitors watching those same colour-coded bars move up and down as investors around the world buy and sell stocks on the NASDAQ market in New York. The bar graphs represent the bid and ask prices for hundreds of tech stocks, and as investors around the world buy and sell shares, the bid and ask prices move accordingly. To a highly-trained eye, accurately predicting the way they move – and placing an order in time – means money in the bank, and a BMW in the driveway.

Market momentum is everything and stocks are held an average of only three minutes. Profit might only be one-half, one-eighth or even one-sixteenth a cent per share. With enough stock churn, the profits – as well as the losses – can add up quickly.

Peter Beck, the Hungarian-born entrepreneur who founded Swift Trade three years ago, knows that day trading can be a risky business – especially for the uninitiated. But he believes that with the proper training and with a healthy dollop of self-discipline, day trading can be considered an honourable livelihood.

"Trading is a profession. It has been for the last 200 years and if you do it professionally, it's not gambling. If you do it without knowledge, it's worse than gambling," he said.

Swift Trade, Canada's only day trading company, is a full-service provider with more than 400 traders across Canada, 124 of them in the company's Toronto office.

For $4,000, recruits receive a six-week training program supervised by Beck's partner, Charles Kim. Once completed, graduates are offered a work environment in Swift Trade's offices, with satellite hookups to the NASDAQ as well as a variety of software to help them ply their craft. Trades can be executed in half a second with Swift Trade receiving 2.5 cents per share for every completed trade.

In mid-winter, the company's gross revenues exceeded $20 million and although he won't go into more detail for the privately-held company (Joseph Ianni is the third partner), Beck, 45, points out that Swift trade operates 10 offices across Canada and plans to open five more in the next year.

The management troika are so confident in the company's future that they plan to open a second floor in their University Avenue offices and hire108 employees who will each trade on the company's account.

Kim is confident in his ability to train enough graduates to make it a success. The median income for day traders at Swift Trade is $200,000 U.S. a year, and three to four people earn more than $1 million U.S. per year. The one-year record for a single trader is $8.6 million. The world record is $38 million, racked up by a 28-year-old computer geek trading in Austin, Texas, he said.

But there are plenty who've lost big as well.

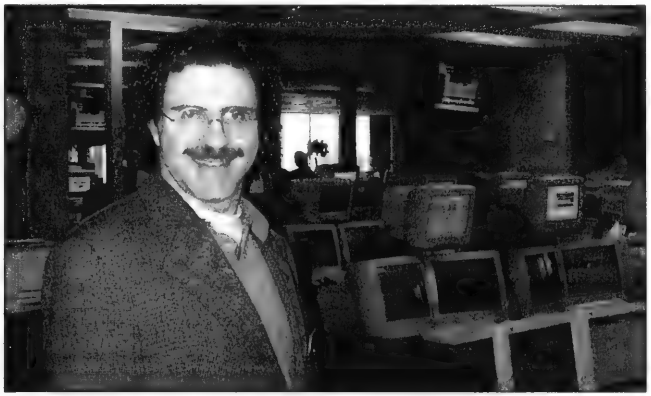
Kim says with the refinement of training techniques over the past three years, Swift Trade has reduced the average loss experienced by rookies trading in the immediate aftermath of the training course from $15,000 to $1,300. "It takes a good three months to start making money," he said.

Aware of the mostly American horror stories of traders losing their homes, Beck has imposed a sort of stop-loss mechanism at Swift Trade. Traders using the company's computers are asked to ante up $25,000 of their own money. Their progress is closely monitored and if their balance drops to $15,000, Swift Trade closes their account.

Successful traders share a couple of key characteristics, particularly self-discipline and self-confidence, Beck said. They are taught to set hard caps on their losses and they're told not to watch what people at neighboring desks are doing. People have thrown in the towel after losing only a modest amount, or even with small gains, if their neighbours are making big money. "They lose confidence comparing themselves to others," he said.

Day traders share no one specific demographic or background, he continued. The company receives applications from the 20-34 age cohort, and from 55-year-olds, who've made their money and are looking for a hot new thing.

Young people who are good at video games tend to be most successful. "Pattern recognition is key," said Kim.



Peter Beck believes day trading can be considered an honourable profession.

That's a far cry from the staid old world of investment, where a thorough understanding of financial markets, a grasp of macroeconomics, access to the most up-to-date information and the analytical tools to put it all together are considered important.

To be a successful day trader, you don't even need to know which companies you're trading. Traders buy and sell four-letter stock symbols, and knowing what the company produces or even its full name is unimportant, Kim said.

Volatility is the key – whether up or down – and NASDAQ offers plenty of movement each day. "The trend is your friend; don't fight the trend," Beck said.

Beck, a member of the Jewish motorcycle club, Yids on Wheels, was a middling day trader in his day, but nowadays he's too busy running the company to trade actively. An entrepreneur who loves the thrill of setting up a business, Beck has tried his hand at a variety of enterprises since moving to Canada in 1979.

A chef by training, Beck soon realized that he'd never get rich preparing meals. He tried his hand at selling bottled water and then he marketed his own brand of pet food. Neither venture was a success, but he learned from his mistakes.

While working in commercial real estate, a small newspaper article about long distance market deregulation gave him an idea. In 1988 he started his own long distance carrier, ITN Corporation. To raise capital for the business, he applied for 17 credit cards and maxed them all out, raising between $60,000 and $70,000. Within five years, the business was a roaring success worth $30 million, with a roster of blue chip clients, and he was fielding buy-out offers from major telcoms.

With the money he earned selling the business, he moved to Paris for a year, enjoyed the food and took a side trip to climb Mt. Kilimanjaro. But he tired of the decadent lifestyle and was soon looking for a new business opportunity. A 1997 article in Wired magazine about day trading fired his interest. It seemed to offer the opportunity to combine two of his loves, the stock market and technology.

In May 1998 Beck and his partners created Swift Trade. "At the time, I didn't have to use my credit cards," he quipped.

With $250,000 in initial capital, the business – like the stock market at the time – took off.

"I suppose when you start a business, you imagine it to grow big. To grow this fast? No, I didn't expect it," he said.

The King of Zing brings his put-downs to Toronto

Just don't call his barbs 'insults,' Don Rickles insists

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Pop quiz: Don Rickles is a) an acid-tongued wiseacre to whom everyone is either a "dummy" or a "hockey puck"; b) a surprisingly mild-mannered, polite, serious man; or c) both.

Don't be too surprised if it's c). But you'll probably get more of a) if you go see Rickles' July 9 show at the Hummingbird Centre, where he's slated to appear with fellow in-your-face comic Joan Rivers.

Rickles, also known by such showbiz monickers as Mr. Warmth, the Merchant of Venom and the King of Zing, has a great Jekyll-and-Hyde thing going: by night he's the wise-cracking Borschtbelt/Vegas lounge mainstay whose shtick for the past 40 years has been insults, barbs and biting put-downs delivered rat-tat-tat to whoever's unfortunate enough to be in his line of sight.

By day, like on the phone last week with The CJN from his Los Angeles home, he's a disarming, soft-spoken, co-operative guy. Nice even. Not a zinger to be zung.

Not that the opportunity wasn't presented.

"I have some questions you've probably been asked a million times," says The CJN reporter. (Pause for sarcastic rejoinder).

"Well, lissen, you got a job to do," comes the soft reply. "What can I tell ya?"

He can tell us the answer to the question every Rickles fan has: How does it feel making a living insulting people?

Ahh… there's that word.

"You use the word 'insult,'" Rickles observes. "I don't like to call it that, but I was always stuck with it and it took me a long way, so I settled for it. But with 'insult' you think of someone mean, and I've never been mean-spirited. I never will be; otherwise, people wouldn't come see me." To Rickles, offending someone for real wouldn't be funny.

"So it's not an 'insult.' It's an exaggeration of everything about us. And that's exactly what I do, whether it's religion, your appearance or what you wear or how you talk or where you live. I just take that, and exaggerate it, and have an attitude on stage, which is the funny, angry guy."

Rickles, now 75, has been that guy since 1957, when his signature style was born at a small Hollywood nightclub. One night, Frank Sinatra himself walked in, and the unknown comic from New York had the chutzpah to rib, "Make yourself at home, Frank. Hit somebody." Old Blue Eyes loved it, and he became a Rickles booster.

The comic turned serious for a bit part in the 1958 movie Run Silent, Run Deep. By the early '60s, his act was headlining the Vegas clubs. His big break took place on the Tonight Show in 1965, where he had Johnny Carson in stitches.

That style, he recalls, sprouted from a "very poor" early act in strip bars, in which he'd mug, tell old jokes and do impressions. One night, he was heckled, and Rickles did something no comedian had done before: he heckled back. The crowd loved it.

His early influences were Carson, Milton Berle, and Rickles' father, "a ribber."

Rickles tallies a long list of TV roles, including the short-lived Don Rickles Show and CPO Sharkey. On the big screen, he's appeared alongside Clint Eastwood in Kelly's Heroes and was Robert de Niro's faithful sidekick in Casino. And of course, die-hard fans know he was the voice of Mr. Potato Head in Toy Story and Toy Story 2. In between were several forgettable roles in beach blanket movies.

Rickles, who often draws attention to his Jewishness in his act, does a fair bit of behind-the-scenes Jewish communal work (he and his wife Barbara raised funds to build a gymnasium at Sinai Temple in Los Angeles). And he insists he's not the guy you see on stage.

"I'm a human being," he explains. "I do rib people, my intimate friends. But I don't go to a cocktail party and walk into a room and say, 'You're a dum-dum.' When the occasion's right, I kid around. But I would like to think of me as being a very average, normal guy."

Which he is. That hockey puck.

Don Rickles delivers his shtick rat-tat-tat on July 9.

The cast of Slap, a play about a Jewish partisan in World War II.

Fringe play tells the story of Jewish partisan fighter

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

Toronto playwright Evan Brooker says that his latest play, Slap, is a story about a side of the Holocaust that has largely remained obscured.

"Jews are told about the Holocaust and the focus is on how many people died – I wanted to tell the other side of the story, about the Jews who fought or escaped death," says Brooker, who based the play on the experience of one of his father's acquaintances and the research he did about various Jewish partisan movements.

Slap, which will be performed at the Toronto Fringe Festival from July 5-15, is about Mordechai, a partisan in World War II who shot and killed an unarmed German officer.

Mordechai is visited by the officer's apparition, and the play focuses on the relationship between the two in a work Brooker describes as sombre, but has strength, maturity and humour.

"Mordechai is haunted by what he did, but he feels justified in some ways," Brooker says.

"The play is really about guilt and explores the way people are affected by the things they have to do to survive."

Ironically, the only character in the play who is not guilty is the Nazi officer, but Brooker isn't worried that this twist will infect audiences with anti-Semitic feelings.

"Mordechai is painted like a human being who was in an ugly situation and didn't know what to do. He comes out as an affable character we can all relate to," says Brooker, who notes that he has "a lot of respect for what we've gone through as a people."

In fact, his maternal grandparents, who were originally from Lublin, Poland, escaped the Holocaust. "When Germany and Russia divided up Poland, my grandparents escaped to the Russian side, and were shipped to Siberia where they worked as slave labourers."

Brooker was born in Toronto and has been writing plays since high school. He went to acting school at the University of Alberta, where he earned a BFA.

"Mid-way through I realized that I didn't like acting – I always wanted to write."

Now, in addition to writing and producing plays, Brooker is a freelance writer whose work has been published in the Globe and Mail, and he is also co-owner and advertising representative of the art and culture magazine, Lola.

Slap is his fifth play but the first to overtly deal with a Jewish theme. Yet as he's gotten older, Brooker says that he's become more interested in his own origins. With his 33rd birthday quickly approaching, he says his next few plays also deal with Jewish issues.

YIVO EXHIBIT SPOTLIGHTS STAR OF YIDDISH THEATRE

An exhibition about Yiddish actress Ida Kaminska opened recently at the YIVO Institute for Jewish Research, in its headquarters at the Centre for Jewish History in Manhattan.

The exhibit, which is titled Ida Kaminska (1899-1980): Grande Dame of the Yiddish Theater, includes theatre posters and many photographs and photo stills. Kaminska, whose parents ran a touring Yiddish theatre, made her theatrical debut at the age of seven. In 1916 she was a member of the Vilne Troupe, which became famous for its avant-garde productions of Yiddish and European theatre classics.

She and her first husband, Zygmunt Turkow, established the Warsaw Yiddish Art Theater in 1923. After the war she and her second husband, Meir Melman, founded the Jewish State Theater in Warsaw. Her most famous role was in the Oscar-winning film, The Shop on Main Street. She and Melman left Poland for the United States in 1968.

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

Travel Lawyers Congress: Toronto lawyer Gerald Heifetz of the firm Heifetz, Crozier, Law, has a long association with the travel industry. His father Solomon opened Dominion Travel in 1922 and his brother Murray ran the Toronto-based travel agency from 1946 until the family sold it about 10 years ago.

Gerald Heifetz has made a specialty of travel law, and is one of three founding directors of the International Forum of Travel and Tourism Advocates, which was established in Jerusalem in 1983. IFTTA now boasts a membership of about 70 lawyers, advocates and educators from 13 countries.

Since its inception IFTTA has always maintained a strong Israeli connection. Its membership presently includes about 10 Israelis, including the current president, Jose Fosman, who lives in Tel Aviv. "We also have members from Egypt," Heifetz notes.

A main goal of the organization is "to provide a forum for the exchange of information on the legal aspects of travel law, and to encourage the establishment of common legal standards for the travel industry," he says.

Heifetz is preparing to attend IFTTA's 13th international conference. The four-day gathering commences July 11 in Dundee, Scotland.

Jonas (Clement Sibony) loses his son's foreskin in Nina's (Rona Hartner) purse in the film Dad on the Run.

Farcical look at bris ritual

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

It's hard to believe that a comedy can be made about a circumcision ritual, but that's exactly what Dad on the Run is.

Jonas – a not-especially observant young Jewish father – is told to follow a North African custom and bury his son's foreskin within three days of the bris.

Forgetting he's been carrying around the foreskin for three days, Jonas, a musician, is reminded of the ritual by his wife on the third day, just as he's performing at a bar mitzvah.

Determined to follow what he believes is a halachic requirement, Jonas leaves the bar mitzvah determined to find a suitable burial spot.

What follows is a farcical adventure through the streets of Paris that involves three bumbling thugs, a busload of Catholic youths on the way to a papal rally who mistake him for a vagrant, a pair of yellow shoes, a paranoid Romanian woman who ends up with the foreskin in her purse and finally has Jonas locked in a truck full of fish. (A bit of an allegory going on here, Jonas, belly of a whale, fish truck, get it?)

In French with subtitles, Dad on the Run, is directed by Dante Desarthe and features Clement Sibony as Jonas. It opens July 6 at the Bayview Cinemas in Toronto.

Who Wants Life?

This story has been adapted from the Gemarah (Avodah Zarah 19b). It takes place about 2,000 years ago. A shuk is an outdoor market.

"Strawberries, fresh strawberries, only half a shekel for a bucketful!" yelled a vendor. "Pots and pans repaired, pots and pans repaired," cried another. Shulamit loved going to the shuk with her mother.

"What healthy looking chickens!" exclaimed Imma (Mom), pushing her way through the crowd towards a young chicken vendor. "We'll have roast chicken for Shabbat."

"Hey lady, wanna buy some Egyptian linen?" inquired another salesman.

Ignoring him, Shulamit's mother pushed on. "Good afternoon Ishmael, how much are are those chickens you're selling?"

"Five shekels each."

"Five shekels!" shrieked Shulamit's mother. "For these scrawny chicks I'll give you three.

"Three shekels!" Ishmael indignantly shot back. "These are my parents' best home grown hens!"

"All right, I'll pay four."

Ishmael begrudgingly accepted the four shekels, and deposited a flapping, squawking chicken into her net bag. "Have a good Sabbath, and see you next week, Mrs. ben Tal."

"Now let's look for fresh apricots. I've been meaning to try Aunt Berria's recipe for apricot sauce. Shuli, could you please carry the chicken?" Shulamit accepted the bag, and the two of them continued through the bustling marketplace.

"Who wants life? Who wants life?" called out an old man. Shulamit looked up at him. He was wearing a colourful turban and a long flowing purple robe. "Who is that" she asked. "I want life!"

"That's...Rabbi Alexandry," replied her mother, puzzled. "I thought he was a scholar. I didn't know he was...also...a salesman."

A crowd began to form around the old rabbi. "I want life!" rasped a very old lady. "What's your secret?" inquired a boy. "What medicine is he selling?" queried another. "Tell us, tell us," they urged him.

"I'm not selling anything," responded Rabbi Alexandry. "The recipe for life is FREE! King David told us how (see Psalms 34:13-14): 'Who wants life, who wants to see long days filled with good?' " He raised his voice, and continued, " 'Stop yourself from gossiping, and don't tell any lies. Turn away from evil, and in its place do good. Look for peace, and chase after it!' "

"That's not free, that's hard work!" grumbled a bystander.

But Shulamit piped up, "Now that's a great recipe!" and she walked with her mother to the apricot vendor.

Fair Funding for Education: An Idea Whose Time Has Come

On June 27, 2001, Bill 45 was passed by the Ontario provincial legislature, clearing the way for the provision of tax credits for parents of children in independent schools beginning in January of next year.

For the Jewish community and its partners in other faith communities, this marks a major victory in the 17-year struggle for equity in education funding. Over the next few months, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region, UJA FEDERATION and other representatives of the coalition for fair funding will continue to work with the Ministry of Finance on the regulations through which the tax credits will be applied. These discussions will likely take place until early fall to ensure the maximum benefit to independent-school parents.

Here is what some of the pioneers of the fight for fair funding say about the passage of Bill 45:

"Bill 45 is an extremely important step toward ending Ontario's historic inequity in funding religious education and in helping to make school choice a financially viable option for all parents in this province. We commend the government and those members of the opposition who supported this initiative in the face of often hostile criticism. Many of these criticisms are based on conjecture, and we look forward to the day when these ominous premonitions are proven to be baseless and the tax credit becomes a natural part of the landscape in education policy."

— PROFESSOR ED MORGAN, Chair, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region

"It's a great step for education in the province of Ontario. It's especially meaningful to the Jewish community, and we hope the regulations that will be established this summer will be very favourable to our day school parents. We congratulate the government of Ontario on this bold move that brings Ontario in line with most other Western democracies."

— DR. SEYMOUR EPSTEIN, Executive Director, UJA FEDERATION Board of Jewish Education

"This means that finally, many families who up to now, were financially unable to provide their children with an education in Christian schools will now have that opportunity. The passing of Bill 45 makes that educational choice more accessible to more people. On a broader scale, I believe that there is evidence in other places around the world that both student achievement and parental satisfaction are raised through choice in education."

— JOHN VANASSELT, Director of Communications, Ontario Alliance of Christian Schools

"We are extremely happy that the government has finally come through with the passage of Bill 45, which is extremely beneficial for the Muslim community. In the process, the government has done two things. Parents have a financially fair choice in how to educate their children in order to maintain their cultural heritage, their language, and their religion. Secondly, it allows the government to provide a partial remedy to the United Nations decision that the government was discriminating against other religious minorities by funding Catholic schools. We are very strongly in support of the public school system, and we would like to see it strengthened even more, so that it may flourish."

— MUHAMMAD KHALID, Director of Education, Islamic Society of North America – Canadian Chapter

Ontario Finance Minister Jim Flaherty, center, reads a thank-you card presented to him on behalf of students who attend independent schools in Ontario. (Left to right) Ed Morgan, Attorney General David Young, Minister Flaherty, MPP Tina Molinari (Thornhill) and Muhammad Khalid.

"In this one watershed act, the government has moved parents toward a true choice in their responsibilities to educate their children within a respectful and accepting educational system. The Jewish community in particular will be a significant beneficiary of this act. The vision of the legislature passing such enabling legislation will be recalled in the years ahead not just as a bold new step, but as recognition that the Canadian Confederation of 1867 defended such rights."

— ROBERT SAMERY, Chair, Jewish Parents for Equality in Education Funding

"It's taken our Ontario community 50 years of hard work by many individuals and organizations to reach this historic milestone. The detailed regulations will come out in the next few weeks following discussions with the government. Those regulations will make all the difference in determining how many of our parents will actually benefit from this new law, and to what extent. We still have much work to do. The naysayers and scare-mongers are out in full force with their own agendas. It is very important that we express our thanks and support to this government – the only government in the last half-century prepared to take the political heat for doing the right and equitable thing for our families and children."

— RABBI YISROEL JANOWSKI, President of the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools

"The passage of this bill by the Ontario legislature in franchising parents for some relief of the burden of tuition fees is a step that is long overdue. Members of the Jewish community have been lobbying for the redress of a long-standing injustice over a period of decades. The Harris government should be commended for showing the political will and fortitude to ultimately provide equality in education funding for all children in this province."

— RABBI YITZHAK WITTY, Executive Director Emeritus, UJA FEDERATION Board of Jewish Education

Soccer players angry at Maccabi Canada

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A group of soccer players is angry at Maccabi Canada for dropping the team from the Maccabiah Games roster, and some are threatening legal action to recover $1,800 they say was supposed to pay for their now-aborted trip to Israel.

Maccabi Canada has promised to look into the matter following the Games, but would not promise a refund at that time.

Marc Askenasi

The dispute centres on the $1,800 contribution each athlete was asked to make towards the $5,000 cost of sending team members to the Games in Israel. Members of the soccer team contend that if the team cannot go to the Games, which begin on July 16, the contribution should be returned as soon as possible.

Maccabi Canada spokesman Allen Gerskup said he understands the players' disappointment, but he cautioned that nothing can be done until the Games are over.

Even at that point, there is no guarantee the players will be reimbursed. The $1,800 is considered a tax deductible donation and tax receipts were issued for the amount. It is not clear that Maccabi Canada can reimburse the money even if it wants to, he said.

The internecine squabble adds an unfortunate stain to an already diminished Games. Until three weeks ago, it appeared the uncertain security situation in Israel would lead to a one-year postponement of the Games. Spooked by suicide bomb attacks in the heart of Tel Aviv and Netanya, athletes the world over withdrew from their Maccabiah teams. Fund-raising efforts – which usually kick into overdrive as the Games approach – were put on hold in the expectation the Games would be delayed.

With the unexpected decision by the Maccabi World Union to go ahead with the Games, Maccabi Canada was left with little time to finalize the countless logistical details that go into sending a team to Israel. Matters were complicated by the surprise resignations of two senior officials – president Roy Salomon and national fund-raiser Martin Schwartz. Salomon resigned three weeks ago when Maccabi Canada voted to participate in the Games; Schwartz resigned about two weeks before that.

The result has been a leaderless organization scrambling to assemble Canada's Maccabiah team. Gerskup said he and senior Maccabi officials Nancy Rubin, Bernie Offstein and Bob Luxenberg "are running the show by committee."

Faced with a budgetary shortfall and $300,000 in outstanding pledges, the group has had to make some tough choices in paring down the Canadian Maccabiah contingent. At one point it was expected that Canada would send about 350 athletes. Organizers now hope to take perhaps 170 athletes to Israel, Gerskup said.

The men's open (adult) soccer team was one of the casualties of the cost-cutting exercise. However, the junior team (14- to 16-year-olds) will make the trip as will other teams.

That has angered the adult soccer players.

Marc Askenasi (right) in a game versus a team from Holland.

"A lot of players are very upset," said Mish Levkov, a midfielder/striker who plays college ball at Cleveland State University. "With the $1,800, they're going to take the money and fund another team. If we're not going, we should get our money back."

Levkov, 22, said he and most of the other players are students who are chronically short in cash. "I worked by butt off to make that money and I looked forward to the opportunity to play in Israel. Now, it's a big slap in the face."

Marc Askenasi, a 19-year-old midfielder who plays for McGill, said he worked hard for the money and now feels Maccabi Canada is taking advantage of the athletes on the soccer team. He is skeptical about Maccabi Canada's promises to look at the issue at a later date.

If the team is short in money now, "how are they going to come up with that money later?" he asked.

Askenasi said when the players were told they would have to come up with the money, they were told they would be reimbursed if the team did not go.

Sean Kane, the team's goalie, who plays for York University, said he was intensely disappointed to be told the team was not going to Israel. Each of the players worked hard to prepare for the competition and he was looking forward to returning to Israel after participating in a Birthright visit in February.

"It was sort of like a dream to go back and play for your country in Israel," he said. "Playing in the Maccabiah Games would have been huge. To play against and meet other Diaspora Jews… it's a beautiful thing."

"It's not only about soccer. It's about going to Israel as well," said Kane, 21.

Kane and Levkov suggested legal action is being considered.

Gerald Olin, the team's Winnipeg-based manager, said, "We're disappointed we're not going. Although we know Maccabi Canada tried very hard to make the situation work, it hasn't for us. It's reasonable for the team to be reimbursed before they leave for the Games.

"Our players are ready to return the charitable receipts right away."

Olin said two of the players who would have made the team – Roy Raviv and Sam Hazan – were already living in Israel and Maccabi Canada would not have incurred any cost in flying them there. But they too were told to pony up $1,800, Olin said.

He suggested the youth team was taken ahead of the adult team because they would be easier to supervise.

Gerskup confirmed that line of thinking: "The juniors are under our control over there… It's safer to take younger kids."

Gerskup said he too was disappointed the soccer team will be left behind, "but we had to make a decision. We only have money for 165 to 170 people.

"We understand their situation. They have to bear with us… All our efforts, time and energy are just to get over there."

The soccer players were not the only casualties of the budgetary shortfall – and not the only athletes to face a loss of $1,800. The women's open (adult) basketball team was also dropped, but "they had a tough time even fielding a team," Gerskup said.

Junior tennis and most of the squash team were dropped, while the track and field and swimming teams are down by 50 percent. Junior boys baseball is staying home (the tournament was cancelled), while Tae Kwondo is down to two fighters from eight.

In Israel, the Games have been shortened to seven days from 10 and there is speculation only about half the originally anticipated 5,000 participants will attend.

Golf tourney to aid disabled vets

TORONTO — A golf tournament to raise funds on behalf of disabled Israeli war veterans will be held on July 26 at the Angus Glen Golf Club.

Funds raised at the event will provide equipment and programs at Beit Halochem rehabilitation facilities in Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, Haifa and Nahariya.

At the facilities, military veterans receive care and rehabilitation through hydrotherapy, physical and rehabilitative therapy and family-oriented programming. More than 50,000 disabled veterans and their families benefit from the programs.

The tournament is sponsored by Beit Halochem Canada, which has contributed millions of dollars to support disabled veterans' rehabilitation since it was founded in 1978.

The tournament is sponsored in part by Obus Forme Ltd., a Canadian-owned company that develops body care products, including backrest supports.

Event information is available by calling 416-787-8950 or by visiting www.advi.ca.

Stories that touch the heart

By ELI RUBENSTEIN ALEC GELCER

Encounter on Bloor Street

Sometimes, the words we say echo back to us in ways we would never expect.

The other week, I was speaking at my shul on the subject of tzedakah. After stressing that tzedakah was one of the very highest of Jewish values, I added that everyone, including the poorest of the poor, is commanded to give. After all, just because a person is poor, is that a reason to deny them the mitzvah of tzedakah and its reward and satisfaction?

Jewish tradition says that the one who gives actually receives far more than the one who receives. And everyone has something to give, and everyone needs to give in order to feel a sense of self-worth and to feel that they are doing their part in mending the world.

A few days after, running late for a meeting, I found myself on Toronto's bustling Bloor Street trying to find a place to park. I was in luck. I found a spot. I parked, got out, and started searching through my pockets. No change! Going through my pockets again didn't help. Still no change! Not a penny! I looked around desperately.

A man happened to be passing. His clothes were shabby, he slouched as he walked, his eyes were downcast. It was obvious that he was very poor, almost certainly a panhandler. Suddenly something came over me, and I heard my own words from the previous Shabbat.

I said, "Excuse me, sir, I don't have any change for the meter. Could you spare a loonie?"

He looked at me, taking in my nice shiny car. He blinked a number of times. This was a new experience for him. Then he drew himself up and said: "Sure thing!"

He stuck his hand in his pocket and pulled out a whole handful of change. "Help yourself," he said grandly.

"Thanks a lot! I really appreciate this!" I said, taking a loonie and popping into the meter.

The man had turned and was walking away when I called out after him.

"Wait!" I said. "Look! The meter didn't work! Do you think you could spare another loonie?"

Again he blinked several times. I could see that he was beginning to wonder if I wasn't some cunning scam artist who preyed on unsuspecting panhandlers and separated them from their hard-won earnings.

Then he said, "Sure thing!" and gave me another loonie.

This time the meter worked, (he watched to make sure I really did put the money in), and once more I thanked him.

"No problem, buddy!" he said, and with a proud flip of the hand, as if he were Rothschild himself, he turned to go.

But I stopped him again.

"Wait," I said. "I must give you something for your trouble."

I looked into my wallet, intending to give a five dollar bill, or at the most a ten. But all I had were twenties.

The man waited patiently. I had no choice. Heaven had intervened. I gulped and handed him the twenty.

"Gee, thanks!" he said, and went on his way with a perkiness in his stride that had not been there before.

The next week at shul, I recounted my adventure on Bloor Street, about how a homeless person had helped me out, and how he was rewarded with my $20 gift, which was a bit more than I wanted to give.

"Actually, you didn't give him $20," one of the observant and mathematically inclined shul goers pointed out.

"Since he gave you two loonies, you ended up giving him $18."

In Jewish numerology, 18 adds up to chai, the Hebrew word for "life," and for that reason Jewish donations are very often made in multiples of 18.

What was so lovely about this encounter was that both of us gave, both of us received far more than we gave, and both of our lives were enriched by the encounter.

WE SELL Amana FOR LESS

A great company dish for a dairy dinner; brunch or lunch! Serves 8.

- 1 cup brown sugar
- 1/2 cup margarine
- 2 tblsp. light corn syrup
- 5 tart apples, peeled, sliced in medium slices
- 3 large eggs
- 1 cup milk
- 1 tblsp. vanilla extract
- 1 loaf of French bread, cut in thick slices

Cook brown sugar, butter, corn syrup in medium saucepan over medium-high heat 4 to 5 minutes, until thick. Pour into 9"x13" glass baking pan. Top with sliced apples.

Combine eggs, milk and vanilla. Dip each bread slice into egg mixture for 15 seconds. Place soaked slices on top of apples in pan. Cover and refrigerate at least 8 hours or overnight. Uncover and bake at 350°F for at least 35 minutes or until set.

About Life

Dear Ella,

A close friend of mine has just bought some new furniture for her house. She was very excited when she called me about it and asked me to come over to and give her my opinion.

I didn't think anything of it at the time, as Deb and I go way back and we always consult each other on any number of issues.

When I got there, I realized she really wasn't kidding. She bought new living, dining and bedroom furniture. Practically redid her whole house!

We walked through her house and she asked me straight out what I thought about each and every piece. I have always been honest with her in the past, as she has with me, and I didn't feel this was any different; however, when I told her I wasn't crazy about the dining room set she informed me that she got all the furniture at a bankruptcy sale and it is non-refundable. She was quite hurt and upset that I didn't like the dining room. I tried to backtrack, but the damage was done. Was I wrong to give her my true opinion?

Truth or Dare

Dear Truth or Dare,

The first thing you have to do when someone asks for your opinion is think about whether they really want a truthful opinion or whether they are fishing for reassurance or a compliment.

Deb was so excited about her new furniture and she simply wanted to share her happiness with a friend and show off her great find. You put a damper on all of that by telling her you didn't like her dining room set.

I believe in telling people the truth, but not necessarily when the the situation is a fait accompli. If there is no way out, whether it's as small as a new dress or as big as a new house, let them enjoy and feel they did the right thing. If there is a way out, then by all means, offer your thoughts.

Do some preliminary questioning about the purchase before you give your opinion. Ask where, why and when. Only then can you give an informed answer – but only if you're asked!

Fireworks expected in Durban

UN conference on racism

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Despite the threat of a boycott by the United States and rumblings of discontent by Canada, the latest draft of a text up for adoption at a United Nations-sponsored conference on racism next month describes Israel's treatment of Palestinians as "ethnic cleansing" and a "crime against humanity," and revives the notorious Zionism-equals-racism issue.

The declaration, which calls Zionism a "movement based on racial superiority," is slated for final approval at the conference's last preparatory committee July 30 in Geneva. The conference itself, dubbed the World Conference Against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance, held under the auspices of the UN Commission on Human Rights, is scheduled to take place in Durban, South Africa, Aug. 31 to Sept. 7.

Canada's delegation at the Geneva preparatory committee (the last in a series of so-called "prepcoms") and at the Durban conference will be led by Hedy Fry, the federal secretary of state for multiculturalism and the status of women.

Mordecai Richler 1931-2001

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Introduced to Mordecai Richler when his reputation as a writer was starting to soar, Saidye Bronfman remarked: "You've come a long way for a St. Urbain Street boy."

Richler, apparently sensing the patronizing tone, retorted: "And you've come a long way for a bootlegger's wife."

That story, recounted in Joe King's book From the Ghetto to the Main: The Story of the Jews of Montreal, illustrates how Richler did not hesitate to tell anyone what he thought if he felt they had it coming.

His unexpected death finds many in the Jewish community still perplexed by the man. What might have been unbridled pride that a working-class Montreal Jew could have achieved international literary status is tempered by the lingering feeling that he deliberately stereotyped Jews, especially in his earlier novels, for his advantage.

Fearless iconoclast remembered

In the past decade, he was embraced by the community more readily. Not only was his later fiction more gentle, many Montreal Jews loved his fearless confrontation of Quebec nationalists in his journalism, as he increasingly took on the role of polemicist.

"His relationship with the Jewish community was ambivalent," said King, a journalist and former public relations director for what was then Allied Jewish Community Services.

"The community was not comfortable with him – they were ultra-sensitive, in fact – and he was not comfortable with them."

Bronfman Fellows

TORONTO — Three Torontonians – Sara Brodbar-Nemzer, Naomi Hart and Noam Lockshin – are among 26 North American Jewish teens now in Israel as Bronfman Youth Fellows. The five-week program, a project of the Samuel Bronfman Foundation now in its 15th year, is geared to developing future community leaders committed to Jewish unity. Included are programs with Israeli counterparts and seminars with political and literary figures representing a broad spectrum of views on key political, religious and social issues facing Israel and world Jewry. All expenses are covered by the fellowship.

Belgium Cancelled

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has cancelled a trip to Belgium after a judge there opened an investigation into his role in the 1982 Sabra and Shatila massacre in Lebanon. Sharon was due to leave this week on his first official visit to Europe since taking office as prime minister.

Secret Launch?

JERUSALEM — Israel has carried out a secret launch of the Jericho II medium-range ballistic missile last week, according to the London-based Al Hayat newspaper. The paper said the rocket is capable of hitting every Arab capital in the region.

Vying for Leadership

JERUSALEM — The speaker of Israel's Knesset, Avraham Burg, submitted his candidacy for the leadership of the Labour party last week, just ahead of the deadline for filing. Burg and Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer are the only candidates vying in a primary to be held this fall.

Parley for Agunot

JERUSALEM — L'mann B'nos Yisrael International, a New York-based organization dedicated to helping the plight of agunot, is holding a one-day conference here July 14. Speakers include Rabbi Shmuel Gamliel, director of the agunah department of the Rabbinical Courts of Israel, and Mattie Klein, founder and president of the organization. Agunot and former agunot who wish to have their names added to a list, which will be included in prayer at holy sites in Israel, can call Klein at 718-338-0833.

World

Swiss Jews Rally

BERN — More than 500 members of Swiss Jewish youth groups held a rally last week here to show solidarity with Israel. The demonstrators also called on the Swiss media to stop running stories with an anti-Israel bias.

Paper Silenced

MOSCOW — Officials in a city south of here have halted publication of the anti-Semitic newspaper, Russkaya Gazeta, and started a criminal case against the editors for fomenting ethnic hatred. The action in the city of Tula came as Russian police are intensifying their actions to combat hate groups.

Won't Get Involved

BRATISLAVA — The Slovak government says it will not interfere in a dispute between the Jewish community and Germany over compensation for the deportation of 58,000 Jews to Nazi concentration camps by the pro-Nazi wartime Slovak state. In March, a Berlin court rejected a $60-million lawsuit lodged by Jewish leaders, ruling they were not entitled to claim compensation on behalf of the victims.

Rabbi Dies

WASHINGTON — Rabbi Ira Eisenstein, a leader in the Reconstructionist movement, died June 28 near Washington, at the age of 94. Rabbi Eisenstein was a confidant of Rabbi Mordecai Kaplan, the founder of Reconstructionism, and helped to create the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College.

Rabbi Arrested

NEW YORK — A chassidic rabbi in North Carolina has been arrested on charges of lewdness relating to a woman in his home, according to the Raleigh News & Observer. Rabbi Pinchas Lew conducts services for students attending the University of North Carolina. In 1991, Rabbi Lew was convicted of driving the getaway car in an Iowa armed robbery.

Swimmer to Games

LOS ANGELES — Olympic triple gold medallist Lenny Krayzelburg is warming up for the Maccabiah Games, which are slated to begin July 16 in Israel, by working with 95 kids at the swim camp of the Westside Jewish Community Centre, where he had his first job after his family arrived in 1988 from the Soviet Union. Krayzelburg will skip the World Championships in Japan to participate in the Maccabiah Games.

YU Discriminates

NEW YORK — Yeshiva University's policy of barring gay couples from its married student housing may violate New York City anti-discrimination statutes, New York state's highest court ruled last week. The Court of Appeals ruled that a lesbian couple should be allowed to sue YU's medical school for bias based on sexual orientation. The decision overturned two lower court rulings, which found the college's policy did not discriminate because it also applied to unmarried heterosexual couples.

Zhirinovsky Admits Father Was Jewish

JERUSALEM — Russian ultra-nationalist Vladimir Zhirinovsky last week finally admitted something he has denied for years: his family on his father's side was Jewish.

In an interview with Israel Radio's Russian-language station, Zhirinovsky said his father's family were Polish Jews. But all of them died during the Holocaust, he said, so today, he has no connection with the Jewish side of the family.

The admission follows a letter Zhirinovsky sent to the chief rabbi of Russia this month, in which he wrote that he "identifies with the victims of the Holocaust" and "repudiates all those expressions that were misunderstood," referring to statements that have earned him a reputation as one of Russia's most anti-Semitic politicians.

Polish magazine under fire for wartime memoir

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The editor of a Polish magazine will meet this month with representatives of Canadian Jewish Congress to discuss an article that Congress believes repeats anti-Semitic stereotypes of Jews.

The article, which appeared in the February edition of Miedzy Nami magazine, is presented as part of the memoirs of author Chris Gladun's late mother, Janina Sulkowska-Gladun.

The memoir repeatedly refers to Jews in a way that "tars the entire Jewish community," said Len Rudner, Congress' director of community relations.

In a letter to Jolanta Bugajski, editor and publisher of Miedzy Nami, Rudner points out the article,which reflects Sulkowska-Gladun's memories of the Soviet occupation of Poland from 1939-41, describes members of the local Communist party as almost exclusively Jewish.

The memoir repeatedly refers to Jews as supporters of the Communist regime and it alleges the NKVD (the Soviet secret police), aided by Jews, decided the fate of its victims. It also states innocent people were in fear of arrest because of a Jewish militia.

"Your readers are presented with a litany of horrors either perpetrated by 'Krzemiencian Jews,' 'a young Jew,' 'two local Jews', 'a young Jewish female doctor,' 'Jewish assistants,' 'armed and bullying Jews,' 'teenaged Jewish thugs,' 'a local Jewish militiaman' and 'a rather dim-witted Jewish girl.'...On only two occasions does Mr. Gladun provide us with the actual names of these supposed Jewish perpetrators. For the rest, he is content to let the words 'the Jews', without proof, stand as condemnation of an entire community," Rudner's letter states.

Bugajski said she was not troubled by the references to Jews in the memoir, although she said "it's not my point of view or that of anybody else working for us.

"You have to show readers what other people think. It doesn't matter if you agree with it or not. You have to let her (the author) express views the way she sees things. It's her memoir. It's her words, not my words," Bugajski said.

"I certainly stand by what my mother wrote and her experiences," Gladun said. "I take umbrage at any accusations [the article] is anti-Semitic."

Gladun, a writer, researcher and poet, said the memoir is "just a representation of what was happening in Eastern Poland. It's not a reflection on all Jews...Certainly a sizable minority of Jews did collaborate with Soviets in imposing Soviet power in Eastern Poland."

Gladun, a past member of the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation, said a community can't be judged by the actions of a few individuals. Referring to the current controversy over the Polish village of Jedwabne, in which a recent book revealed that Jews were massacred by Polish villagers early in the Holocaust, he said that just as all Poles were not responsible for the murder of Jews, not all Jews were like those who collaborated with the Communists.

Rudner said the cumulative effect of the repeated references to Jews "is to present Jews in a highly unflattering and extremely negative way, It would be difficult for a reader to go through this portion of the memoirs and not conclude all Jews are like this."

Rudner said Congress will ask Bugajski to run a letter in the magazine expressing the concerns of the Jewish community.

"If [Bugajski] fails to understand the damage this kind of unsubstantiated claims make to the Jewish community, we will have to see what legal remedies are available to us," he added.

Miedzy Nami is a mostly Polish-language publication with 10,000 copies printed monthly.

The flaw in information

From the editor's desk

We all understand and agree that democracies function better when their citizens are informed. Information is the bedrock of free, independent conclusions that are, it is hoped, thoughtfully and logically arrived at. To be the strongest foundation possible, that bedrock of information must be secure and reliable – that is, as comprehensive and accurate as possible under the circumstances.

However, because information is created and disseminated by human beings, it acquires the imperfection of human beings. Generally speaking, therefore, despite our best efforts, information is always somewhat flawed.

As a disseminator of information, The CJN is constantly and acutely aware of this structural flaw inherent in information. We try our best to overcome that flaw and to ensure, as far as we can, the total reliability of the information we publish.

As individuals who are consumers of information, we must also be constantly and acutely aware of the flaws inherent in what we read. The quality of the information we receive, naturally, will have a bearing on the quality of the conclusions we reach.

The information is even more flawed, more suspect as it were, when it is infused with personal opinion and subjective interpretation. Yet as long as we are aware of this subjectivity and are able to assess it on that basis, we cannot object too loudly.

In news reporting, there should not be opinion and interpretation. In feature writing and analysis, however, opinion and interpretation provide colour and voice even as the subjectivity becomes the distinct identities of the newspapers we read.

A powerful illustration of how this subjectivity affects the identities of the three daily Toronto broadsheets occurred last week. One single, discrete event was covered in three distinct ways.

Statistics Canada released data from a study it conducted for the first time ever examining the link between family income and the type of school attended by the children of that family.

The headline of the story that ran on page 3 in the Toronto Star was: Tax Credit Boon to Top Earners. The accompanying subhead read: Report Says 37 Percent of Private School Students From Families Making $100,000 Plus.

The headline of the story that ran on page 1 of the National Post was: Private Schools Not Just For Rich: StatsCan. The accompanying subhead read: Similar Proportion of Pupils From Each End of Spectrum.

The headlines were diametrically opposed.

An individual glancing at the headlines would have been justified in assuming that the stories were based not only on different data but on conflicting data. There was no immediate and obvious way to reconcile the two opposing views.

Helping to clarify matters somewhat was the headline of the story that ran on page 8 in the Globe and Mail. It read: Private Schools Defy Elitist Image. There was no accompanying subhead; rather, a bar graph aided readers in understanding the story's myriad statistical and monetary details.

Setting aside, for the purpose of this column, any conclusions about what the content of the stories tells us about the reporters, the headlines tell us a great deal about the newspapers themselves.

The Toronto Star has been implacably and fiercely opposed to the recent decision by the government to provide a measure of tax credit assistance to the parents of children who attend independent, private schools. The headlines reflected the editors' opposition. Moreover, the Star was the only paper, in its headline, to write about tax credits, thereby directly tying the apolitical StatsCan study on family and income to the very political issue of the tax credit. The two other dailies omitted any reference in their headlines to the highly charged, red flag-like "tax credit" reference.

The National Post has generally been supportive of the tax credit initiative; its headline was consistent with its editorial stance.

Interestingly, the Globe and Mail, like the Star, has been unequivocal in its opposition to the tax measure. And yet its editorial position could hardly be inferred from the headline on the StatsCan report.

In addition to the headlines, the stories' first paragraphs further illustrate and underline the subjectivity of information we read.

Elaine Carey of the Toronto Star wrote: "More than a third of the people who will benefit from the provincial government's controversial tax credit for private schools are the ones who need it the least, a new report shows."

Julie Smyth of the National Post began her story, saying: "Twenty-nine percent of children attending private schools come from families with incomes below $50,000 a year while 26 percent come from families earning at least twice that amount, according to Statistics Canada."

Marissa Nelson of the Globe and Mail wrote: "Most parents who send their children to private schools in Canada earn an annual income of less than $100,000, a report [released yesterday] says."

The differences in these headlines and in these stories should reinforce for us the need to be vigilant in assessing what we read, since what we read says as much about the author and the newspaper as it does the subject of the story.

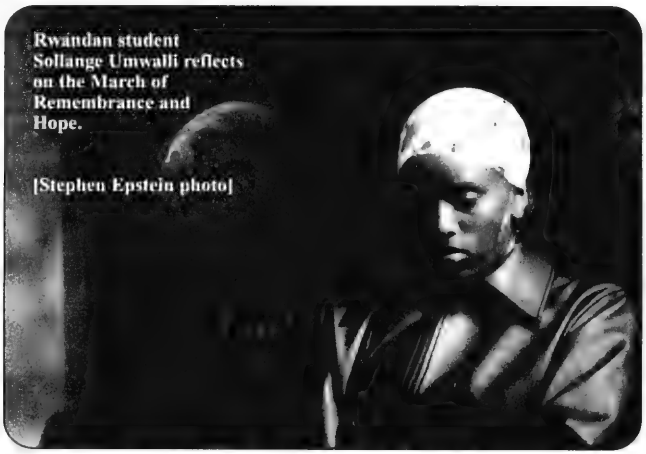
March educates gentile students about Holocaust

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter



Rwandan student Sollange Umwalli reflects on the March of Remembrance and Hope.

[Stephen Epstein photo]

TORONTO — Juliet Karugahe, Gilbert Gatali and Sollange Umwalli are students of history, in particular of Jewish history, and more specifically yet, of the Holocaust.

They are familiar with the events of the 1940s, though it's not man's capacity for evil that intrigues them – in their own lives, they've seen plenty of that and they're well aware that man's inhumanity can be unleashed at any time with devastating results.

Rather, it's the Jewish people's capacity to absorb such punishing blows, to acknowledge it and to get on with their lives that interests them.

Rwandans whose families were devastated in the Hutu genocide of Tutsis in 1994, Karugahe, Gatali and Umwalli feel a special affinity to Holocaust survivors. Though their experiences were separated by 50 years, they feel there is much they can learn from them that can help they and their fellow Rwandans heal from the catastrophe that befell them. They believe the Holocaust teaches profound, universal lessons in tolerance and acceptance and in not turning a blind eye to the horrors being experienced by other people.

Karugahe, Gatali and Sollange were part of a group of five Rwandan students who participated in the inaugural March of Remembrance and Hope (MRH), a program that brought together about 400 gentile students from around the world on an educational trip to Poland.

Fourteen Canadian students, including the Rwandans, participated in the trip, in which they visited sites of Jewish life and death in Poland.

In one week, the group visited the Jewish quarters of Warsaw and Cracow, where Jewish life flourished for a thousand years, and they also witnessed the death camps at Auschwitz-Birkenau and Majdanek.

Despite the emotional surroundings and the anguish it sparked, the MRH was a very beneficial program, the three said.

"It's a great program, very educational," said Karugahe. "It's good for the Rwandan community to see how people are dealing with this after 50 years. There is a lot of trauma in our community and it's not being dealt with."

Divided into 10 buses, each manned by guides, MRH staffers and a Holocaust survivor, the participants relied on each other for support to get through the wrenching experiences.

A special bond developed between Sylvia Gutman, a child survivor of the Holocaust and, as she put it, "my beautiful Rwandans."

"Because we share so much and because of my willingness to open my heart and not stay silent, it allowed the Rwandans to speak about their genocide as well," Gutman said.

"When you speak up, it brings you out of hiding and a whole different relationship opens up between yourself and the world," she said in a telephone interview from her home in Washington.

"It was very, very deep and moving... There are things about their genocide they'd never shared before. Because they were with me for seven days, they opened up, and when they did so, it was healing and liberating. It's cathartic."

Gatali, 23, who was born in Rwanda but moved to Toronto before the slaughter began, said "understanding the Holocaust helps you understand current Rwandan experiences. You see that similar things happened to Jews. It creates a common bond."

Umwalli, who was born in a refugee camp in Kenya 22 years ago, said she returned to Rwanda shortly after the genocide and was shocked by what she saw: mass graves, bodies lying on the side of the road.

The trip to Poland helped her deal with her pain.

"It was definitely a healing experience to be among people who feel strongly about human rights," she said.

The therapeutic aspects of the trip touched other participants as well. For Gutman, who, with her two sisters was spirited to Switzerland by the French resistance, one of the most emotional moments came at the end of the trip. At a discussion following the visit to Majdanek, a young woman from Germany who had been quiet for most of the trip broke down in tears, stricken by guilt and grief. Gutman strode over to her, embraced her and told her it was not her fault.

"It was such a powerful moment, it reached out across the room and filled everyone's heart," she said.

For Eli Rubenstein, a member of the MRH's executive committee, the closing ceremonies in Warsaw in which Umwalli and Karugahe asked the assembled group for a moment of silence in memory of the fallen Jews and of all victims of genocide, were particularly touching.

"You could've heard a pin drop," he said.

The trip "was an important step. You are not only interested in our own victims, but in all victims of racism and genocide. That's a step towards healing the world," he said.

The program itself is modelled in part on the March of the Living, which brings thousands of Jewish teenagers to Europe and Israel. Rubenstein said March organizers have repeatedly turned down applications from gentiles to join in the program but the MRH responds to that demand.

It is sponsored by the Centre for the Study of Jewish Heroism-March of the Living in Jerusalem and is funded in part by the League for Educational Awareness of the Holocaust (LEAH). The participants are university students, who are at least four or five years older than the March of the Living teenagers.

Vatican-Jewish relations explored

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Christian-Jewish relations have been "radically transformed" since the mid-1960s, says an expert in interfaith affairs.

Since the Second Vatican Council, the Roman Catholic church has abandoned its formerly hostile attitude toward Jews and Judaism, Rabbi David Rosen declared in a speech at Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue last week.

Rabbi Rosen played a role in the establishment of formal diplomatic relations between Israel and the Vatican in 1992. Currently, he heads up the American Jewish Committee's inter-religious initiatives and programming department.

The former chief rabbi of Ireland, he was in Toronto under the auspices of The Miriam Alkin Memorial Fund, Shaarei Tefillah and UJA Federation.

Delivering a speech entitled Vatican Revolution: The Inside Story, Rabbi Rosen surveyed the dramatic changes that have altered the landscape of the Vatican's relationship with Jews.

Thanks to Pope John XXIII, the Second Vatican Council condemned anti-Semitism, stopped referring to Jews as an accursed people and repudiated the notion that Jews are collectively responsible for the death of Jesus.

He described this proclamation as "an historic, epoch-making document."

Since then, he added, the Vatican's relationship with Jews has matured remarkably.

As a result, the church generally views Jews today in a positive light.

Such is the change that anti-Semitism is now considered a sin in the eyes of the Vatican, he said.

Claiming that some Jews are "amazingly ignorant" of the "new reality" in Christian-Jewish relations, Rabbi Rosen asked them for "a degree of reciprocity."

Turning to the current pope, John Paul II, Rabbi Rosen said he is committed to reconciliation between Catholics and Jews.

He disclosed that Pope John XXIII wanted to establish ties with Israel officially, but died before he could act.

Political rather than theological reasons delayed the Vatican's formal recognition of Israel, said Rabbi Rosen, a member of the Permanent Bilateral Commission of the State of Israel and the Holy See.

Only after the 1991 Madrid conference, which paved the way for the Oslo accords,was the Vatican ready to open up to Israel.

Recalling the Vatican's once- hostile stance toward Zionism, he described the Vatican's decision to establish relations with Israel as "an amazing transformation."

Rabbi Rosen said that Pope John Paul II's trip to Israel last year, during which he visited Yad Vashem and the Western Wall, introduced the vast majority of Israeli Jews to the "changed reality" of Christian-Jewish relations.

But challenges still face Christians and Jews, he cautioned.

It remains to be seen whether the Vatican's new approach to Jews will filter down to the grassroots.

And the Vatican has yet to acknowledge that theological anti-Semitism was one of the underpinnings of the Holocaust.

Rabbi Rosen said he doubted whether Jews and Catholics would ever agree that Pope Pius XII, having been accused of maintaining silence during the Holocaust, is worthy of sainthood.

During a question-and-answer session, Rabbi Rosen revealed that the Vatican soon intends to issue a formal statement dissociating itself from anti-Semitic remarks levelled recently by Syria's president in the presence of Pope John Paul II.

Rabbi Rosen pointed out that the Vatican did in fact denounce Bashar al-Assad's "rhetoric of hate" a day after his fiery speech.

He said the Vatican can be supportive of Israel while being sensitive to the needs and pain of Palestinian Christians.

"It's not impossible to reconcile these interests."

The Vatican's position on Jerusalem has changed, he said.

Whereas it once called for Jerusalem's internationalization, the Vatican now regards Jerusalem as a city of three faiths: Judaism, Christianity and Islam.

In principle, he said, the Vatican is not against Israeli control of Jerusalem.

Nova Scotia's Lt. Gov. blends responsibilities

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Myra Freeman maintains that her Judaism is of the utmost importance to her.

"My family and my heritage define who I am and remain my first and foremost commitment," says Freeman, the lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia.

"I know I bring a different perspective to the position than it has brought in the past."

Freeman, the first woman to hold this position in Nova Scotia and the first Jewish woman to hold the position in Canada, was speaking at a recent breakfast hosted by the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue and its brotherhood.

She said she has completed her first year as lieutenant-governor having faced many challenges and having had to make difficult decisions.

Balancing her official responsibilities with her responsibilities to the Jewish people in the country, she said, "I was determined to retain my priorities and uphold the practice of our traditions that have defined our people."

She's also had to balance those responsibilities with managing a 31-room, 200-year-old stone mansion.

"Because I am the first woman, I seem to carry a double role here," she says.

The former educator credited her parents for "instilling in me a gift of values… [they] have taught me that service to one's fellow man is the highest endeavour. I try to live up to that credo."

Freeman grew up in Saint John, whose Jewish community had 500 families in the early 1900s and 120 families in 1960, she said. Today, there are some 35 families in the city, "and it's a struggle to maintain the tradition. My dad is 89 and he usually is the 10th man to make up the minyan on Friday night."

As the Queen's representative in Nova Scotia, Freeman says, her Jewish identity is tested, reminding her of her "essential Jewish being." The first difficulty she encountered was regarding the installation, which traditionally takes place on Saturday. Last year it was held on Simchat Torah.

After many consultations with her rabbi and government officials, the date was changed, as well as the prayers, and a private ceremony was held.

"I did not compromise my beliefs and I was given the utmost support from the Order," she said. "I marvel at the respect that others have for us outside the Hebrew faith."

Indeed, Freeman has brought Jewish rituals to Government House, affixing a mezuzah to the door post, arranging for kosher food, lighting Shabbat candles and saying the brachot. When the kiddush was recited, she said, "[it] was highly emotional – it reverberated off the walls of this 200-year-old house."

Jewish commitment is no longer an impediment to achieving recognition in the broader community, she said. You can be "very Jewish and achieve in a non-Jewish world.

"It is no longer an excuse for one to say that they work in the broader community and they have no time to contribute to Jewish causes."

Along with our responsibility to the Jewish community, she said, "we have a responsibility to the secular community because this great community afforded us a home and an opportunity to achieve. As a Canadian woman and as a Jew, I have succeeded in blending these two responsibilities."

A NEW SERIES?
"BLOOPERS AND OTHER EMBARRASSING MOMENTS"

Justice not on this court's agenda

Atrocities perpetrated by and against human beings are recorded throughout the pages of human history. But it was only after World War II, with the partial legacy of the Nuremberg trials, that such execrable, horrible, detestable behaviour became legally proscribed throughout the world as crimes against humanity. At least, that was the theory. The practice has fallen far short.

Alas, the existence of the legal proscription has hardly mattered at all in preventing, in every decade since the Nuremberg trials, the slaughter of innocents or mass murder on a genocidal scale.

Thus, one can hardly quibble with the general intent and importance for all mankind that such criminal behaviour be prevented and punished. Indeed, the international community is presently struggling to find adequate legal machinery to bring mass murderers and other perpetrators of crimes against humanity before the bar of justice.

But the "universal jurisdiction" conferred in the early 1990s by the parliament of Belgium upon the Belgian judiciary to try individuals accused of war crimes or of crimes against humanity regardless of the defendants' nationality or the place of the alleged offence, is surely not the way to deal with the issue. In the long run, in fact, it will probably set back rather than advance humanity's cause.

Two complaints under the law were filed last month – by Palestinians and others – with the special Belgian prosecutor against Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon for his alleged role in the Sabra and Shatilla massacres in Lebanon in 1982. The prosecutor decided there was enough evidence to investigate whether formal indictments should be brought against the Israeli prime minister.

The prosecutor's decision was shocking and offensive. The Jewish community inside and outside Belgium were outraged. "We'll do everything to make sure this trial does not take place," David Susskind, one of the leaders of the Jewish community in Belgium told Ha'aretz recently. "We are horrified," Susskind said. "This is meant to hurt Israel. After all, the same thing could be done to Belgium for its role in the elimination of Lumumba in the Congo. There's a desire to blacken Sharon's face. To demonize him."

The proceeding against Sharon has less to do with justice than it has to do with politics. Some 20 years ago, by an Israeli commission of inquiry, Sharon was found to have been "indirectly responsible" for the Shabra and Shatilla murders.

Surely, if justice were the Belgian court's true aim, it would want to try the men whose hands actually wielded the knives across the throats of the Palestinians in Sabra and Shatilla. It would want to try the men who actually ordered the murderers into the refugee camps. It would, in short, want to try the men who were directly responsible for the slaughter, most of whom are known to Belgian authorities, some of whom are even today public figures in Lebanon.

Criticism of Pope unwarranted

I must take issue with Lily Kutner's characterization of Pope John Paul II's recent conduct in Damascus as "silence" (CJN, Letters to the Editor, June 7). Simply because the Pope did not respond to President Bashar Assad's pathetic and transparent appeal to religious bigotry in the way Kutner would prefer does not justify her berating him. Kutner completely overlooks what the Pope did say:

"We all know that real peace can only be achieved if there is a new attitude of understanding and respect between the peoples of the region, between the followers of the three Abrahamic religions. Step by step, with vision and courage, the political and religious leaders of the region must create the conditions for the development that their peoples have a right to, after so much conflict and suffering. Among these conditions, it is important that there be an evolution in the way the peoples of the region see one another, and that at every level of society the principles of peaceful coexistence be taught and promoted."

While not the outright confrontation Kutner desired, the Pope was hardly "silent" about his position. Why should an apology be demanded of the Pope because he rebutted Assad's religious bigotry with a vision of interreligious harmony and not with the counterproductive direct attack Kutner would have wished? Does an elderly pilgrim engaged in a historical and complex mission for peace among many divided peoples deserve such castigation simply because he chooses a different strategy than instant combativeness? Does Pope John Paul's record of frequent and forceful condemnations of anti-Semitism suddenly mean nothing when, in the pursuit of peace in the long-term, he chooses not to stoop to a public confrontation?

Rather than indulging in unjust criticism, it might be more constructive to consider the remarks that the Pope offered on the same day: "The language of peace and culture must replace the language of incitement and hate."

World War II lesson forgotten

David Marx (CJN, Letters to the Editor, July 5) asserts that true peace between Israelis and Palestinians is probable. As proof, he cites as an example, among others, the peace enjoyed by the United States and Japan, former enemies.

What Marx has ignored, however, is the process by which the attitudes between the parties changed. After World War II ended, Japan was decimated. The United States set itself up in the position of reforming Japanese society, especially the political landscape of Japan. Gone was the all-powerful Japanese emperor – replaced by a mere figurehead position and a democratically elected government. Gone was any notion of Japanese supremacy as a race.

The politicians and diplomats of the late 20th and early 21st centuries have forgotten the lessons of their post-World War II predecessors on how to turn an enemy into an ally. Instead of reforming the Palestinian school system to have it teach tolerance, Israelis let the Palestinian schools use Jordanian texts from 1967 on, until their recent replacement by PA textbooks that were even more racist and anti-Semitic. Instead of establishing a clear presence in all parts of Jerusalem, Israel's government took down the Israeli flag from the Al-Aksa Mosque one week after the victorious Israeli soldiers placed it there and ceded administrative jurisdiction over the whole of the Temple Mount to the Wakf authorities.

As long as Israel pursues a path to peace that does not begin by expunging the preaching of hatred and anti-Semitism in textbooks, sermons and the PA media, and by setting up a system for democratically elected representation for the Palestinians, there will only be bloodshed.

God involved in Entebbe miracle

I just finished reading your articles on the Entebbe rescue (CJN, June 28).

While it is true that the IDF soldiers acted with tremendous courage, the ultimate credit must be given to God. I find it very disturbing that in a Jewish newspaper, God isn't credited as a partner in this miraculous event. How can we expect His assistance in Israel's current crisis if we don't show our gratitude for His help in our previous times of need?

Correction

In a letter last week by Issie Veisfeld (CJN, July 5, "Romania should admit atrocities"), we inadvertantly altered the author's meaning, implying that Tudor Vadim was elected president. The sentence should have read, "In the recent election in Romania under President Ion Iliescu's government, a well-known extreme right, anti-Semite fascist leader, Tudor Vadim, was elected with approximately 30 percent of the votes." The CJN regrets the error.

Should Clinton have spoken on behalf of Yad Vashem?

An appropriate guest

The recent visit to Toronto by former U.S. president Bill Clinton on behalf of the Canadian Friends of Yad Vashem generated a storm of controversy within the community.

Everyone agreed on the worthiness of the cause; but not everyone could agree on the choice of the former president as a spokesperson for that cause.

The disagreement, which centred on the response of Clinton's administration to the slaughter of some 800,000 Tutsis in Rwanda by the neighbouring Hutu, begs the question: what should have been the proper Western response to the slaughter?

By HENRY ODIMBE OJAMBO

The guest appearance of former U.S. president Bill Clinton at Canadian Society of Yad Vashem's recent fund-raiser made the news because of the protesters who greeted him. The protesters were demonstrating against what they perceived as Clinton's inaction in the approximately 800,000 deaths that occurred in Rwanda during his years in Washington.

Although it is always easy to blame the Americans for all political and economic crises, the fact is that there is only so much the Americans can and should do around the world. To hold the United States responsible after the fact for not having intervened to prevent a crisis, is to invite effective – i.e. massive – U.S. intervention before the crisis occurs.

For example, during the past several years, almost two million people have died in the civil war in the Congo, a bloody and senseless conflict known about, but ignored, by much of the outside world. One might rightly ask where the United Nations has been with its mission of humanitarian relief/intervention to nations in need. But no one, including Clinton's most vocal critics, has seriously advocated U.S. military intervention on the scale that it would have taken to avert the Rwandan killings in the early 1990s. One can only imagine the outcry from African political leaders, among others, if President George W. Bush were to decide to invade and occupy a part of Central Africa. Even if this were done in the name of averting genocide, one can foresee African politicians, spokespersons, NGOs, and others claiming that imperialism by any other name is still unwanted imperialism.

Bill Clinton

None of this is meant to apologize for the inaction of the United Nations and the only remaining superpower in the face of the Rwandan crisis. It is only to point out that there is a realistic limit even to American power, especially when it comes to mobilizing collective action. Unlike veto powers, it takes much more for any member of the Security Council- be that U.S.- to sponsor a proactive role. Conceptual points aside, the fate of peacekeepers in Somalia was still so fresh that unless effective intervention was permissible (which unfortunately it has never been), any leader of a Western country had to be extremely cautious about intervention in Rwanda. There is certainly a limit to how much the world actually wants America to do on its own.

There is no doubt that Clinton, like most other presidents, can count both successes and failures during his time in office. This is as true in international politics as it is on the domestic front. The disaster in Rwanda, however, is one for which Rwandans themselves, as well as the neighbouring African countries who acted only in their own self-interest, Belgium, as the former colonial power whose legacy of divisive rule lives on in central Africa, and the United Nations, whose relief/intervention efforts are administered too selectively, can share in the blame.

As a champion of improved race relations everywhere, Clinton more than most knows the meaning of the phrase "never again." And unlike many others who could share in the blame, Clinton will be remembered for participating in the healing process in Rwanda as evidenced by his visit to Kigali. Though he may not have been able to implement the phrase and put an end to irrational violence, he does have the moral stature to say it. For the above reasons, our condemnation of Clinton's appearance at a Holocaust memorial ought to be reviewed.

Wrong man to invite

By JULIET KARUGAHE
Special to The CJN

On June 25, 2001, members of the Rwandan and Jewish communities stood in silence to protest former U.S. president Bill Clinton's appearance at a fund-raiser organized by the Canadian Society of Yad Vashem.

The horrible and well-orchestrated plan by a group of Hutu extremists to systematically wipe out Tutsis only succeeded because of the passive and negative response of the international community, which could have easily stopped this heinous crime, but didn't.

Clinton's administration, which was aware of the genocide occuring in Rwanda, was instrumental in blocking United Nations action as a powerful member of the Security Council. In May 1994, Clinton passed a presidential directive (PDD 25) that imposed impossible restrictions on U.S. support for UN peacekeeping, indicating an absence of political will to end the genocide.

In addition to placing conditions on their own participation, the United States, through former U.S. ambassador to the UN Madeleine Albright, imposed these conditions on other countries. The Clinton administration also insisted that what was happening in Rwanda constituted "acts of genocide," well aware that if it officially recognized what was happening as such, then it was obliged, as a signatory to the 1948 Genocide Convention, to act.

The United States also delayed the shipment of armoured personnel carriers to UN forces on the ground, ensuring no serious action could be taken until the genocide was over. Stalling strategies, such as raising prices and arguing about the colour of the carriers, went on for two months. Calls for help from Major General Dallaire, the Canadian commander of the peacekeeping force, were ignored.

Clinton's apology for Western inaction and his claims that it was due to ignorance are false. A true apology must be accompanied by actions to rebuild a nation and a people shattered by this horrible tragedy. Hopefully such an apology would pave the way for a U.S. inquiry into its inaction during the genocide.

The Rwandan youth who organized the Toronto protest are very sensitive to Holocaust issues and have close ties with the Toronto Jewish community. We are often involved in commemoration events organized by both communities and we support efforts to memorialize the six million Jews murdered during World War II.

Last month I, along with four other Rwandan young people, was honoured to travel to Poland on the first March of Remembrance and Hope. It was heart-wrenching to see even a tiny fraction of the unimaginable horrors faced by victims and survivors of the Holocaust, and this journey will remain one of the most profound experiences of my life.

For us in the Rwandan community, it was also a painful reminder that what happened then could happen again. It is a slap in the face that Yad Vashem would invite Clinton to speak, and even more outrageous that they did this knowing full well his moral record in Rwanda. Clinton deliberately looked the other way during genocide. He has no place speaking at such an event.

I cannot forget the words of a Holocaust survivor I met in Poland: "We want you to see through our eyes," and "Let our fate be a warning to you."

Unfortunately, as we have painfully seen, this warning was not enough for the world. When we say "never again," let us show that we mean "never again" for all human beings.

The unknown Israel

Shortly after Yom Ha'atzmaut, I received the following letter:

On the occasion of Israel's 53rd anniversary, it is good to be reminded that not everything is bleak in the Jewish State:

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Israel is the only country in the world where…

When you greet the street cleaner in the morning, he may respond with a quotation from the Tanach or siddur.

When a family goes away for a holiday, they routinely turn over their keys to a neighbour who needs spare sleeping space for holiday guests.

Bins of bread and rolls, and of milk bags, are deposited at dawn in front of closed grocery stores and restaurants and no one touches them. (Unless someone needs his groceries early, in which case he takes what he needs and sends a child, after the store opens, to pay the bill.)

On the months with the major Jewish holidays, government pension cheques are sent out a week before the holiday, instead of the usual last week of the month. Government employees receive a substantial advance on their salary the week before a holiday as well, to make holiday buying easier.

There are 12,000 doctors for a general population of 4.5 million (the highest ratio in the world).

There are over 10,000 synagogues.

Youngsters get up in the bus and give their seats to elderly or pregnant passengers, or get yelled at by strangers if they don't.

Fathers of newborns are granted paid leave from work; and if it's a boy, they get the day of the brit off too.

All Jewish holidays are national holidays.

There is a supply of Psalms available for the families of patients in hospital waiting rooms, as well as in doctors' and dentists' offices.

After office hours, mayors answer phone calls at home from regular citizens. Doctors, lawyers and other professionals also list their home phone numbers and accept calls after hours with good cheer.

Strangers stop you in the street at midday and tell you to put a hat on your child's head if the sun is too strong.

An invitation to a simchah automatically implies husband and wife, children, grandparents and grandchildren, without reply cards.

Before the High Holy Days, and on each erev Rosh Chodesh, special buses are scheduled by bus companies to take people to cemeteries at the outskirts of the cities.

Bible contests are held regularly in the Armed Forces.

All these, and many more, are the reasons that so many of us love Israel.

Beyond our wildest dreams

In 1982, during High Holiday services, I had a subversive thought: why were the Torah readings, Haftorahs and honours all being taken by men? Clearly, many of them were unfamiliar with the texts they were reading. It was equally clear, as I looked around at other women in the congregation, that we could do what they were doing, and do it well.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

In my naiveté, I wrote to the ritual committee chairman asking him to explore participation of women in services. My first inkling that I had done wrong was a call from the president: why wasn't my query addressed to him? Then everyone weighed in: the committee would consider my letter and get back to me. The rabbi asked if this was not just an idea imported from general feminist militancy. Already my dander was up. My daughter and many of her friends, all literate in Hebrew, would have bat mitzvahs in the coming year. What about them? The battle was joined. What happened next was not pretty, but it ultimately involved the sisterhood, the entire synagogue board, the rabbis, the congregation and probably the entire watching community.

The outcome was ultimately good for everyone. Our synagogue is now egalitarian: women are counted in the minyan, lead services, read from and are called to the Torah, and have become so well educated in synagogue and personal observances that I derive immense pleasure from their strengths. We were supported in this struggle by many men, and ultimately the changes were effected with less animosity than I expected, during the heat of the debate.

The outcome also included the founding of an entirely new congregation which is not egalitarian in any way, but attracts young and old, and satisfies a need in our community for a warm, welcoming and unique congregation. In fact I now have daughters who chose two paths: one egalitarian, one less so – and I rejoice in both of them.

In the spring, I had the pleasure of reading Torah for the first time, along with other men and women, including my daughter – and my daughter outshone me, as I knew she would.

(Both daughters had bat mitzvahs with their own aliyot; both did their own readings.)

Why recount what is now history? This month my Women's League of Conservative Judaism Outlook magazine took a retrospective look at women rabbis who have been graduated from our seminary and now serve in North American and Israel. While our modest, west-coast fight is a slender victory when weighted against the incredibly more difficult fight to have women ordained as rabbis (and cantors), the message is the same.

In October 1983 (a year after my letter to our synagogue board) the Jewish Theological Seminary voted to admit women to their theological school. What a bombshell! Today 35-40 percent of the rabbinical student body is female. Women are still less than 10 percent of the Rabbinical Assembly, but every year our numbers grow. More significant to me is the increasing number of women who assume public roles in congregations, and the new ceremonies that mark women's milestones. And while nay-sayers predicted that once women got to "run the shul" men would leave in great numbers, the opposite has happened. Our combined strengths have made our synagogues vibrant places of worship and joy.

Of course it is not just the Conservative synagogues that have achieved equality for women. Jewish renewal, Reform and Reconstructionist movements also ordain and train women. And what greater boon could it be that Orthodoxy also has recognized women's scholarship, opening yeshivot to give Orthodox women eager to engage in deep textual study, access to our texts, and in Israel, a voice in the male-dominated rabbinical courts?

Imagine if we were told that women were unfit to practice medicine, law, dentistry, car repair, welding, nuclear medicine, scientific research? Suppose we had waited until the 1980s to be admitted into these professions? Suppose Jews had been banned until then? Would there not have been an outcry? How bitterly we remember the quotas that lasted until the 1950s, the Montreal strike when the first Jewish intern dared to enter a public hospital there!

Rabbi Adin Steinsalz, a great mystic and scholar, called the Talmud the greatest product of the Jewish people. He was wrong. It was the greatest product of half of the Jewish people, the male half. Imagine what we will accomplish in the next two millennia, now that the other half is included.

The formula for synagogue success

I have, for some time, been fascinated by the subject of synagogue life, wondering what factors have influenced the development of a particular synagogue's philosophy, ideology, organizational affiliation, traditions and customs. As I am a law professor and not a sociologist, my observations are those of a rank amateur. However, I have spent a good part of my life in synagogues, dating back more than 45 years to when my father first took me to Temple Sons of Israel in Sydney. Rather than play the role of "congregational tourist," I have become involved in synagogue life.

Bruce Elman in Windsor

Recently, I once again had occasion to reflect upon this subject. There are three synagogues in Windsor – two Orthodox and one Reform. When I am in Windsor for Shabbat, I attend the, Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue. Later this month, the members of the Shaar Hashomayim will be voting to determine whether the synagogue should remain Orthodox or become affiliated with the Conservative movement. I have been a Conservative Jew all my life and would welcome the decision to become a Conservative congregation, particularly because there are no other Conservative synagogues in Windsor. However, my purpose in this column is not to take sides on this issue. The decision will be left to the membership, who have a longer and greater stake in the matter than do I.

About a week ago, I had a conversation with a few of the individuals who are working to bring about this change in congregational affiliation. They are very worried about the current state of their congregation and they have every right to be concerned. Shaar Hashomayim does not have a rabbi, although they do have a cantor. They are having a great deal of difficulty ensuring the viability of their daily minyanim. Attendance on Shabbat is very weak and there are very few young people attending services at all. The greatest problem, however, may be that those who do attend services are largely uninvolved in the tfillot.

Although I have not undertaken an empirical study, I would assume that the overall participation rate in the various activities and functions of the synagogue is quite low. The individuals with whom I spoke hope that, by becoming a Conservative congregation, they can reverse these disturbing trends and bring new life to their synagogue.

I have been very vocal in this column in celebrating the accomplishments of my Conservative synagogue in Edmonton, Congregation Beth Shalom. About five years ago, when Beth Shalom parted ways with its rabbi, the congregation began having trouble ensuring two minyanim a week. Attendance on Shabbat was poor, there were no classes for adults, the religious school was in disarray and the shul was in debt. Today, by contrast, there are healthy daily minyanim, increased Shabbat attendance, a very large and vibrant Shabbat Minchah/seudah shlishit/Ma'ariv service, regular classes, visiting scholars and no debt.

These individuals wanted to know exactly how we had managed to accomplish all this without a rabbi or a cantor. I had a lot of difficulty explaining it. In my opinion, Beth Shalom is successful not because it is a Conservative congregation (though many of my friends in Edmonton would probably disagree), but because it is participatory – congregants lead the prayers, read the Torah and teach the classes. Of course, this is in addition to those who serve on the board or the women's league executive or assist with fund-raising activities. An ever-increasing number of congregants feel "invested" in the congregation and have taken "ownership" of the synagogue. Some have learned part of the prayers, others have learned to read Torah, and many have made a commitment to regularly attend a weekday or Shabbat service. Some have decided to attend a class at least once a week and others have agreed to lead a class once in a while.

Many congregants find their spiritual fulfilment through acts of social justice – donating to food banks or shelters or organizing yard sales to purchase school supplies for inner city children.

In my view, congregations are successful when their members feel a true sense of ownership and commitment to their synagogue. The key is participation. It struck me that the formula is actually quite simple and is a well-known element in our tradition – Torah, avodah and gmillut chasadim – learning, service or prayer and acts of loving-kindness.

Whatever the congregants of the Shaar Hashomayim decide this month, one thing is certain: they will be successful only if they dedicate themselves to these three pillars of Jewish and synagogue life.

The Kirshner File

A cornucopia of books...

Publishers churn out an endless torrent of books of interest to Jewish readers. Here is the latest batch, just in time for your summer reading pleasure.

For better or worse, Israel is almost always in the news. All too often, however, the context is missing in newspaper stories. Review Essays In Israeli Studies (State University of New York Press), a volume of learned essays examining the Jewish state in all its dimensions, remedies that gap. Editors Laura Zittrain Eisenberg and Neil Caplan are seasoned scholars.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

A biblical figure of immense proportions is figuratively brought to life by Steven McKenzie in King David (Oxford University Press) and by Jonathan Kirsch in King David (Random House).

Orde Wingate, the British army officer who embraced Zionism after being posted to Palestine in 1936, is a legend in Israel. Journalists John Bierman and Colin Smith have written an empathetic biography about him entitled Fire in the Night (Random House).

The American writers Herman Melville and Mark Twain visited Palestine in 1876 and 1869 and wrote impressionistic books about their travels. In American Palestine (Princeton University Press), scholar Hilton Obenzinger connects their respective trips with America's so-called "divine mission" in the world.

As a documentary filmmaker working in Israel for some 30 years, Alan Rosenthal has been an eyewitness to history, having covered the Eichmann trial and pivotal events since then. His memoir, Jerusalem, Take One! (Southern Illinois University Press), is a mix of the personal and the political, and contains 36 black-and-white photographs.

Raquela: A Woman of Israel, the winner of the 1978 National Jewish Book Award, has been reprinted by Three Rivers Press in a revised edition. It is the inspirational story of Raquela Prywess, a ninth-generation Sabra, battlefield nurse and hospital founder.

The Arab economic boycott of Israel has waned since the Oslo peace process. Gil Feiler studies the boycott in a thoroughly researched and thoughful primer, From Boycott To Economic Cooperation (Frank Cass).

Amira Hass covers the Palestinian Authority for the Israeli daily Ha'aretz. In Drinking the Sea at Gaza (Fitzhenry & Whiteside), she writes sympathetically about the lives of Palestinians who live in that impoverished enclave. Read it in conjunction with Larry Towell's Then Palestine (Aperture), a collection of stark black-and-white photographs of Palestinian life and politics in East Jerusalem and the territories.

Barry Rubin, an Israeli specialist in Palestinian affairs, skillfully analyzes the PLO and the Palestinian Authority in an authoritative work, The Transformation of Palestinian Politics (Harvard University Press).

Secular and religious politics coexist uneasily in the Arab world, and in Between Memory and Desire (University of California Press), R. Stephen Humphreys eruditely analyses these tensions against the backdrop of Western colonialism, pan-Arabism, Israel and Islam. Two useful companion volumes are the lavishly-illustrated The Oxford History of Islam (Oxford University Press), edited by John Esposito, and Empires of the Sun (Harvard University Press), a provocative study by Efraim and Inari Karsh of Western imperialism in the Middle East.

Once a kaleidoscopic city of minorities, including Jews, Cairo is profiled in all its permutations and hues by Andre Raymond in Cairo (Harvard University Press), a book of impressive scholarship.

Who could have imagined that a thriving Jewish community would emerge in Germany on the heels of the Third Reich? Jews in Germany After 1945 (Edition Tribune), published in honour of the late community leader Ignatz Bubis, is a collection of topical essays turning on the astonishing Jewish revival in Germany. Divided Memory: The Nazi Past in the Two Germanys (Harvard University Press), by Jeffrey Herf, is about the efforts of two now-defunct states – West Germany and East Germany – to come to terms with a dark legacy. It is superb. The Beast Awakens (Little, Brown), by Martin Lee, knowingly looks at right-wing extremism in Europe since the collapse of Nazism in Germany.

David Vital, in A People Apart: The Jews in Europe 1789-1939 (Oxford University Press), explores the mercurial relationship between Jews and Christians on that continent. Vital's mastery of the sources and the material is nothing less than amazing.

Similarly, Hillel Kieval's Languages of Community: The Jewish Experience in the Czech Lands (University of California Press) is an engaging work of scholarship.

The Jews of Modern France (University of California Press), by Paula Hyman, synthesizes 200 years of history in exemplary fashion. William Carter's Marcel Proust (Yale University Press) is a magisterial and exhaustive biography of a great French man of letters and indubitably one of France's most preeminent Jews.

Originally published in French, Sephardi Jewry (University of California Press) is a rigorous account of Judeo-Spanish Jewish communities that flourished in the Balkans and Asia Minor for more than four decades until the 20th century. The authors, Esther Benbassa and Aron Rodrigue, are specialists in this field.

The University of New Mexico Press has published three books shedding light on Latin American Jews, all with introductions by Ilan Stavans. The Jewish Gauchos of the Pampas, a set of vignettes on early 20th century shtetl life in Argentina written by Alberto Gershunoff, sparkles with vivacity. By contrast, Sun Inventions and Perfumes of Carthage are bracing novellas about Jewish immigrants by Uruguayan writer Teresa Porzecanski. Mestizo, a novel by Argentinian Ricardo Feierstein, is a clever detective story unfolding against the backdrop of an old Jewish family.

Syracuse University Press showcases the myriad talents of Yiddish novelist Chava Rosenfarb in two nostalgic novels, Of Lodz and Love and Bociany, set in Poland.

A Rich Garland: Poems for A.M. Klein (Vehicule Press) celebrates this distinguished Canadian poet in prose and poetry. It is edited by Seymour Mayne and B. Glen Rotchin.

Quest for Inclusion (Princeton University Press), by Marc Dollinger, deftly explains a lingering question: Why, despite their socio-economic status in American society, are the majority of Jews liberally inclined? Jew vs. Jew: The Struggle for the Soul of American Jewry (Simon & Schuster) by Samuel Freedman is a sharply-observed portrait of a deeply divided community.

Legacy: A Biography of Moses and Walter Annenberg (Little, Brown) delves into the lives of two media moguls (TV Guide and Seventeen, among other publications) who've left an imprint on American culture.

Fannie Hurst, pulp fiction novelist and crusader for women's rights and liberal causes, was quite a lady. Brooke Kroeger pays tribute to her in a sprawling biography, Fannie (Random House).

The Bialy Eaters (Bantam Books) is Mimi Sheraton's graceful treatise on bialys, those chewy rolls with a toasted onion centre that originated in Poland. Call it a labour of love. Since we're talking food, Bubbe's Kitchen (Raincoast) is also worth mentioning. It's a compendium of mouth-watering recipes compiled by the Vancouver branch of the National Council of Jewish Women in Canada, with a foreward by Sara Waxman. Similarly, The Book of Jewish Cooking (Berkley) by Denise Phillips is well worth investigating.

Toronto's Orthodox Jewish community serves as social historian Etan Diamond's model for Orthodox suburbia in North America. In his slender but illuminating study, And I Will Dwell In Their Midst (The University of North Carolina Press), he explores their lives through their synagogues, schools and social networks.

Exposed as a forgery in the 1920s, The Protocols of the Elders of Zion has long been used by bigots to defame Jews. In A Rumor About Jews (St. Martin's Press), Stephen Eric Bronner dissects the origins of this pernicious tract and its role in illiberal movements opposed to modernity.

Anti-Semitism was not born yesterday, and in Judeophobia (Harvard University Press), Peter Schafer analyses its roots in the ancient Greek and Roman empires.

The Passion Play in the Bavarian village of Oberammergau, first staged in the 17th century, has offended Jews with its anti-Semitic undertones. James Shapiro discusses the play's traditions and troubles in Oberammergau (Random House), a tart examination of culture, commerce and religion.

Hillel Kook, otherwise known as Peter Bergson, was a Holocaust hero who was instrumental in the formation of the War Refugee Board, which saved thousands of Jews, especially in Hungary. Shake Heaven & Earth (Gefen), by Louis Rapoport, is a biography of Bergson and his life-saving activities.

Reference books are always worth keeping close by. Published by Oxford University Press, The Oxford History of the Twentieth Century and The Oxford History of Modern War are first-rate. The Concise Encyclopedia (Firefly) is packed with 10,000 facts, figures and statistics. The Oxford Companion to Western Art (Oxford University Press), edited by Hugh Brigstocke, is immensely informative and polished.

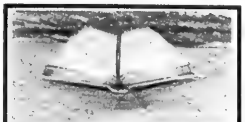
'We must listen with our hearts'

By RABBI ELIE KARFUNKEL



Rabbinic Reflections

Growing up in New York, I can remember my father's firm rebuke: "Always say thank you, and never play hard ball in the street."

The first came fairly easily to me. Saying thank you became second nature. Not playing ball in the street, however, was a different story entirely. It was always so much easier than making the trek to the ball field. Sure enough, the fateful day came in seventh grade when my mighty swing sent a hard ball flying right through the windshield of the neighbours' T-Bird.

The tragic result of that incident (aside from the small monetary issue of replacing a windshield) was my banishment from the all-star game. Why? Because I hadn't listened to my father's rebuke.

Criticism is very hard to hear. What is even harder is to actually listen, internalize the words and consciously decide to make a change.

In parshat Vayechi, we encounter our forefather Jacob foretelling the destiny of his sons, who would become heads of the tribes of Israel. Each tribe is mentioned separately, its strengths, weaknesses and the future of its families foretold individually – with the exception of two: "Shimon and Levi are accomplices..." (49:5). These two brothers are grouped together, seemingly possessing a similar character, and are criticized by their father as one. One would imagine that the future of the tribes of Shimon and Levi would be somewhat similar, considering their common character. However, the tribe of Levi continues on to holiness, while Shimon strays spiritually.

In parshat Pinchas, the differences in the two tribes are accentuated further. We read a fascinating account of Pinchas and Zimri. Zimri was a leader in the tribe of Shimon. In the midst of acting immorally with a princess of Midyan, he is slain by Pinchas, a leader in the tribe of Levi.

Pinchas and Zimri. Sons of Shimon and Levi, brothers with the same character who received identical criticism. From one brother we find a Pinchas, a defender of the morality of Israel, who, in his pinnacle act of defence of God, slays the offspring of Shimon. Righteousness stems from one, immorality from the other. How can it be that two brothers with the same traits can produce such vastly different children?

Rabbi Shimon Shwab offers a beautiful explanation. Shimon and Levi both heard the same criticism from their father. They had acted as accomplices in their crimes, and therefore deserved the curses they received. However, while one brother simply heard the criticism and did not allow it to penetrate his psyche, the other internalized the words, and made a commitment to change. The difference in their attitudes toward the rebuke produced strikingly separate tribes, one capable of complete immorality while the other became a stronghold against it.

The message we must take from Pinchas is how to hear rebuke. It is not always enough simply to hear it. We must listen with our hearts and make a commitment to change, not only for our own sake, but for the sake of future generations... (and all the gleaming windshields on the block.)

Rabbi Karfunkel is the rabbi of the Temmy Latner Forest Hill Jewish Centre in Toronto.

Lauding or leadership

By WAYNE J. LEVIN

Guest voice

The series of UJA/CJC advertisements concerning public funding of independent schools is at best incomplete and inaccurate and at worst revisionism. While UJA and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) spend their time worrying about whose name appears in boldface in these ads, what is happening to the important job of mobilizing community support?

The Ontario Alliance of Jewish Day Schools (OAJDS), whose formation was featured in the ad's list of milestones, was conceived to do this work. What is not widely known is the fact that UJA and CJC objected to the creation of the alliance, and, after two years of internecine bickering and squabbles, permitted it to exist in a less than formidable state. It has been almost four weeks since the Mike Harris government's announcement, and we have seen precious little direction, encouragement or movement on the part of the community "leadership" or the OAJDS.

Contrast the Jewish community's record with the Christian community's accomplishments. Within just 10 days of the acceptance of their tax credit proposal, the Ontario Alliance of Christian Schools' team of part-time staff and volunteers have generated thousands of phone calls and letters to government and opposition leaders. Several have made excellent presentations at the public hearings and the mechanism for further mobilization is at the ready even at this time-constrained end-of-school season.

Leadership is about educating, encouraging and supporting those that are led. I suggest that UJA/CJC undertake an active shul-to-school-to-home campaign featuring a set of knowledgeable speakers. They can start by detailing the basis for the discrimination accusation: why our kids are excluded from tax dollar-supported services equivalent to those provided to a variety of others, not just Catholics.

Continue with the claim that little if anything that we are asking for is unprecedented in public education and that the tax credit may open the door to full equity for our children after the next provincial election. Produce the studies that prove that choice in education benefits everyone and that decades of experience elsewhere, such as in Quebec, British Columbia and Alberta, provides no evidence whatsoever of any harm to anyone as a result of funding independent school education.

Conclude by stating that $90 million, more than twice what UJA raises annually, is sucked out of the community due to this inequity. This discrimination affects us all, particularly at a time when government cutbacks make more and more people dependent on their community for assistance.

Most important of all, UJA and CJC must make it possible for anyone capable of and interested in contributing to this or any struggle to do so, particularly for those causes that affect their lives.

My experience is that there is no shortage of people prepared to contribute real sweat and sacrifice to effect a positive change in their own lives and in the lives of others. Good leadership knows how to muster and harness such talent.

If the government does not see substantial and sustained support from the Jewish community on this issue from individuals and families, it will not only jeopardize this important development in education funding but it may also affect how well we as a community press for other changes geared toward making Ontario a better place for everyone to live and raise a family.

To the UJA and the CJC, I say, forget the congratulatory ads lauding those involved in the effort. This is a time for action. Our leadership should instead involve our community in this most important effort.

Wayne Levin has two of his three children currently enrolled in a Jewish day school and has been active in promoting equal rights in education for over six years.

Shiksa Goddess a mixed bag

Shiksa Goddess (Or, How I Spent My Forties)*, by Wendy Wasserstein, Random House.

Wendy Wasserstein is best known as a successful playwright; The Heidi Chronicles won a Tony Award and the Pulitzer Prize. The Sisters Rosenzweig had a long run on Broadway and she has also written several screenplays, a collection of essays called Bachelor Woman and a children's book.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Shiksa Goddess, an unfortunate title and Wasserstein's first book in 10 years, is largely a disappointment. The 25 personal essays, most of which appeared in a variety of magazines, tend to be brief and inconsequential. Her subjects range from finding a place to live in New York City and dieting to theatre and politics, with constant references to her Brooklyn childhood in the 1950s and the eccentricities of her family members. In one satiric piece she spoofs personal ads for the Last Unattached Male Persons (LUMPS).

In the book's initial essay, the basis for its title, Wasserstein refers to a New York newspaper's disclosure that Hillary Clinton had Jewish relatives by marriage. The author jokes about her mock discovery that she's really an Episcopalian, and begins wearing the faded cardigan sweaters and headbands of her newfound Wasp identity.

The voice in these ephemeral pieces is compassionate and ironic with a self-effacing charm. Wendy is, after all, a celebrated chronicler of haute, neurotic society – and any time spent with her promises some funny glances at much of the silliness that surrounds us.

Wasserstein still feels the tug of her early yeshiva education in Brooklyn. In a recent interview, she confessed, "There's a draw to tradition and to home and to values. I think one of the reasons why I'm a playwright is that there's a wonderful Jewish tradition of culture and regard for language. I was brought up with all of that and I will bring my daughter up with that too."

The final two essays, longer and quite different from the others, redeem the book from its shallowness and frivolity. In "How I Spent My Forties," a piece written expressly for the book, she writes admiringly of her sister Sandra, a corporate executive, who helped to raise the glass ceiling for women. Stricken with cancer, Sandra fought the relentless disease with the same tenacity she brought to her work.

While Wasserstein was supporting her sister and accompanying her to doctors, she was also pursuing single motherhood. After a chain of painful disappointments, she was ready to give up.

"When I called Michael Drews and told him I was willing to try once more, it was Sandra's obstinate and heroic determination that made me do it," Wasserstein says. "Just as she had guided most of the more ambitious efforts of my life, I was neither particularly brave nor insane. I was just, one more time, emulating my big sister."

In the essay "Days of Awe," the author, a new mother at 48, describes the medical and emotional events that led up to the birth of Lucy Jane at 26 weeks and her successful efforts to save her grievously underweight child.

A member of a New York congregation, Wasserstein feels very much connected to the larger Jewish community, and appreciates how embraced she feels when she travels across the country to speak.

"It's very interesting, very nice. They want to feed you. What could be better?"

Shiksa Goddess is a mixed bag of midlife observations and obsessions. Though it's never quite a satisfactory read, it deserves attention for its bits of humour and sagacity here and there and for its evocative narratives about birth and death.

Maccabiah & the Internet

Sixty-nine years ago, a few hundred Jewish athletes met to compete in a unique sporting event in Palestine, the Maccabiah. Since then the Maccabiah has grown to become the premier sporting event for Jewish athletes – and has even become a showcase for future Olympic superstars. In addition to athletic excellence, the Maccabiah has also been associated with politics, controversy and tragedy. As Israel prepares to host next week's 16th Maccabiah, we look at the games past and present on the World Wide Web.

The best place to start is at the official Maccabiah Web site, which paints a colourful picture of the games [http://www.maccabiah.org/etemplate.asp?code=21]. The first Maccabiah games took place in Tel Aviv in 1932. The Games got off to a rousing start as the mayor, Meir Dizengoff, made an entrance into the stadium riding a white stallion. Those first games welcomed 390 people from 18 countries.

Here's a fascinating piece of history about the second Maccabiah in 1935: "In defiance of the British government's strict limitations on aliyah, many competitors took advantage of their being in the Holy Land and decided to stay. Such was the decision of the entire Bulgarian delegation, which unanimously decided to make aliyah and shipped their musical instruments back to Bulgaria instead of themselves."

Over the years, the games have grown and attracted some very talented though still unknown competitors. In 1965, an American swimmer named Mark Spitz won two gold medals in the pool. [http://www.maccabiusa.com/quotes.html]

By 1997, the Maccabiah hosted 5,500 athletes from 50 countries. But the 15th Maccabiah will always be remembered for the tragic accident that caused loss of life and numerous injuries. Four members of the Australian delegation were killed and some 70 others were injured when a footbridge collapsed as they walked over it for the opening ceremony [http://www.jpost.com/Editions/2001/02/14/News/News.21380.html].

Four of the five officials found guilty of negligence for the bridge accident have been sentenced to prison terms. But Australia's participation in this year's Maccabiah was in doubt until Israel agreed to pay $4 million in compensation to Australian tennis player Sasha Elterman [http://www.jpost.com/Editions/2001/06/26/ LatestNews/LatestNews.29114.html].

Special memorial services will be held on Sunday prior to the opening ceremonies. As well, the official Maccabiah Web site has dedicated an area to the late Australian athletes with biographies of Yetty Bennett, Elizabeth Sawicki, Greg Small and Warren Zines [http:// www.maccabiah.org/etemplate.asp?code= 14].

This year's Maccabiah may see far fewer than the 5,000 athletes originally expected to attend. Because of unrest in Israel, the games were only confirmed after the U.S. delegation decided to attend. According to London's Jewish Chronicle, the American "about-face" and pressure by the Israeli government convinced Britain and other countries to send delegations [http://www.thejc. com/Print.asp ?Record=11351].

Athletes this year will compete in more than 30 games and sports, and over 50 countries have been invited. You can find links to many of the national Maccabi sites [http://www.maccabi ah.org/etemplate .asp?code=14]. You can find more background at the Maccabi World Union Web site [http:// www.maccabiworld.org/].

While looking for photographs from previous Maccabiahs, I came across a wonderful Web site I hadn't seen before. The State of Israel's National Photo Collection has placed thousands of historic photos online. Just go to the Collection [http://www.mof.gov.il/pictures/defaulte.htm] type in a keyword like "Maccabiah" and you'll get some lovely results. (Try this site for just about any topic that interests you.)

Although the Maccabiah may not have the international profile of other sporting events, some athletes appreciate it for the values it represents. U.S. swimmer Lenny Krayzelburg won three gold medals in backstroke at the Sydney Olympics. Last December, he said that he planned to skip this month's World Swimming Championships in Japan just so that he could compete at the Maccabiah [http://www.zipple.com/sports/ 20001228_maccabiah.shtml].

Campaign launched for shelter for homeless Jews

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two Jewish women have decided to do something concrete about Jewish homelessness.

Well, not so much concrete as bricks-and-mortar: Lillian Freedman and Maxine Isaacs are leading a campaign to open Toronto's first shelter for homeless Jews.

Even the word shelter is not quite accurate. The women envision a comfortable, non-threatening residence where homeless Jews can stay as part of their transition and eventual reintegration into society.

Dubbed Neve (Hebrew for "oasis"), the freestanding building, to be located, ideally, in the uptown Bathurst Street corridor, will offer residents "anything they need," says Freedman. Already, two Jewish psychiatrists have offered to donate their services, as have a real estate agent, a lawyer and other professionals.

Those who use the residence will have access to medical and dental care, a pharmacist, a social worker, drug and alcohol counselling, even help with job searches and resume writing. It's planned as fully kosher, with Shabbat and holidays marked.

The project is expected to be registered as a charity soon, enabling it to issue tax receipts for donations.

Freedman, a freelance social worker, is no stranger to the issue of Jewish homelessness. A few years ago, she was contracted by Jewish Family & Child Service to locate homeless Jews on the streets of Toronto. She found a dozen who fit the various definitions of homelessness: those out on the street, those in danger of imminent eviction and those staying with friends or relatives.

Isaacs, an Orthodox mother of two, was spurred to action by a CJN article last spring that described the plight of a 61-year-old Jewish former Bay Street financial analyst who landed among the homeless. "I just saw an opening," she says. "As far as I'm concerned, every Jew is responsible for every other Jew, just like the Torah says. We owe this to our community."

Freedman sees a two-pronged approach: a place to go after all resources and luck are exhausted, and an onsite outreach and service centre for the sick and destitute.

But it won't be free. Freedman and Isaacs estimate costs will in the $400 per person per month range, to be paid from clients' welfare and disability cheques. But no one will be turned away. And its focus will be on Jewish homeless, the way native residences cater to aboriginal homeless.

"It won't be an emergency shelter," explains Freedman. "It will be a dignified place to go for as long as anyone wants. It's like having a relative say, 'If you have a problem, you can come to me.' It will be the place to go when you turn to your community."

The women also hope to work with existing services in the Jewish community. JF&CS tops up welfare payments, pays first and last month's rent on apartments and finds emergency hotel rooms. The Kehilla Residential Programme has spearheaded several affordable housing projects in Toronto.

Freedman and Isaacs are looking for donations of kosher food, clothing, appliances, linens and furniture. The biggest donation they seek is the actual property. They're hoping to having something up and running by year's end.

For details, contact Isaacs at 905-764-8096.1

Gilda's Club opens doors at former comedy site

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

TORONTO — After the late Saturday Night Live comedian Gilda Radner was diagnosed with ovarian cancer, she found that it took the support of others to help her regain her sense of humour and learn to appreciate every moment of her life before she died in May 1989.

In her attempt to learn to live with the disease, Radner envisioned a place where people touched by cancer – which includes not only cancer victims but their family and friends as well – could congregate to share their fears about treatment, a place where they could go for moral and emotional support, a place where others could regain their sense of hope and their sense of humour.

The result of this vision is Gilda's Club. Founded in 1995 with a flagship facility in New York, this non-residential community centre has 13 locations across North America and has spread to Europe. Twenty-five more are in development around the world, and the newest Gilda's Club opened here recently.

"It only seemed fitting that Gilda's Club in Toronto should be located in the Old Firehall and Second City site on Lombard Avenue, where Gilda got her first big stage break," said Linda Rechtsman, one of three co-founders of Gilda's Club of Greater Toronto.

"That is why we picked the building – because of the emotional ties associated with it," said Rechtsman, who was involved in negotiations with the city of Toronto for two years before Gilda's Club was allowed to buy the building.

While the facility is marked by the Toronto decorators and contractors who helped renovate the building free of charge, the whole facility resonates with Radner's strength, optimism and sense of humour.

Just inside the signature red doors, colourful murals of Radner are painted on the entrance walls to welcome members into the building, giving them a sense that somehow they should smile.

The second floor, where the Second City stars performed, features the It's Always Something room, "after the title of Gilda's book and a phrase her father always said," and Noogieland, a playroom for children, "because Gilda liked to give noogies," Rechtsman explained.

In addition to more serious lectures on topics such as Talking to your Children about Cancer and Managing Pain, there are workshops and social events, such as Jokefests, Noogiefest (a children's Halloween party) and Comedy Night.

Such programs are needed, no doubt, as cancer affects a staggering number of people. In fact, an Ontario resident has a one in three chance of developing the disease while cancer touches the lives of three out of five Toronto families. One out of four people in Canada will die from the disease.

"Cancer shows no discrimination in terms of age, race, or religion," said Rechtsman, who was drawn to Gilda's Club after having lost two close girlfriends to the disease.

While Gilda's Club is not afraid to talk about dying and will offer bereavement programs in the future, the focus is on Radner's philosophy, "which emphasized living and not wasting a moment," said program director Don Hunter.

"The focus is on making the most of every day and thinking about how you're going to spend the time you've got left."

This philosophy has also had an impact on Gilda's Club workers.

"I've learned how precious life really is," Rechtsman said. "Those with cancer show us the way because they learn to live in the moment and know that relationships are important. The idea of community is also important and that's what Gilda's Club is all about," she continued, noting that the sense of community pervades every level of the club – executive board members, designers, volunteers and those living with cancer.

"Before Gilda died, she said she wanted 1,000 of these places," Rechtsman said, "and I think her dream is coming true."

Goldblatt sees connection between adoption and death

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Michaele-Sue Goldblatt says there is a close connection between her former work as an adoption counsellor and her current position as co-ordinator, aftercare and advance planning at Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel.

"In an adoption, people face loss. The birth family faces the loss of a child, the adoptive family faces the loss of conceiving a child, and the adopted child faces the loss of a family of origin.

"All three parties have to come to terms with the loss. They have to face that loss, or they cannot give freely in a new relationship," says Goldblatt, 54, who has been at Benjamin's for 1½ years.

Goldblatt, a social worker, grew up in Hamilton. She ran a private adoption service in Ontario for more than 20 years before moving to British Columbia, where she worked for a company that ran funeral homes, cemeteries and crematoria.

"I found the work very gratifying; I felt that I could make a difference. Most people are terrified of death. When they have someone to talk to, it makes a difference."

When she moved back to Ontario, she called Michael Benjamin. "I was not looking for a job, I wanted information on Jewish cemeteries. He knew about my work, however, and our talk turned into a three-hour interview.

Michaele-Sue Goldblatt

"We met for 13 hours over the next few weeks, and a job was carved out for me."

Goldblatt meets briefly with families when they come in to make funeral arrangements and then does a follow-up after the funeral.

"I go to the shivah, and after the shivah I talk to them about things they might expect. I am not a counsellor. I just let people know I care. I am a safety net."

In the other part of her job, advance planning co-ordinator, Goldblatt assists people in planning their funerals. "Death is inevitable. People should plan the type of funeral they want in advance."

By pre-planning and pre-funding a funeral, she says, "you have peace of mind. You're not leaving decisions to other people.

"[Those who have pre-planned their arrangements] are usually happy that everything has been arranged. They feel that a burden has been lifted."

She loves working in the Jewish community, she says, "because it is my own community. I can identify with the people I work with and I understand the issues they are facing.

"I also feel honoured to be part of Benjamin's. They show tremendous respect for the deceased, and all rituals are performed lovingly. The level of care is phenomenal. When I talk to families, they feel that care."

Homework Club helps unite communities

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Siham Kamal, 13, loves science and math. One day she wants to be a doctor.

During the school year, Siham and about 30 other Somali kids come down to the Duke of York Public School twice a week in the evenings to participate in the Jewish Somali Mentorship Program, a homework club.

For Siham and the other students it means being able to go to class the next day with homework prepared and the confidence that the work is correct. For many of the 20 mentors, it is a way to fulfil required high school volunteer hours in a productive and meaningful way.

Organized by Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee, the East African Program for the Somali community in Regent Park, and Frontier College, the homework club brings together Somali schoolchildren with Jewish tutors, said Rachel Lasry of Ve'ahavta. This past year, there were 15 kids on a waiting list.

"The Somali children come from refugee camps and a country engaged in civil war," Neema Dahir said in an interview. She has been involved with the program for three years.

Many of these children are very bright kids who have fallen behind because of their circumstances. Their parents simply can't afford to help them, Dahir said.

In Regent Park – an area known for crime and drugs – the kids are committed to coming out and studying with the volunteers. If the kids miss too many classes, they are asked to leave.

Even in the winter, when it gets dark early, the children almost never miss a session, Dahir noted.

The program allows for positive role modelling, and for some kids it provides for male interaction. Even when they don't have homework, they come here for the relationships, Dahir added.

It's been three years since Alison Cohen has been coming down to help. On the way downtown she picks up high school kids from a pre-arranged meeting spot. Some are students at Mackenzie, others from Northern.

For all the tutors, "it's a real challenge teaching kids who have just arrived from Somalia," Cohen said. For example, "it's very hard to get them to connect to plays written by Shakespeare. There is a huge cultural divide."

"But the kids are amazing, they just soak up the knowledge."

A graduate of Forest Hill High School and City Academy, Shane Fenton, 18, has been participating in the program for the past two months.

"I've learned so much from the kids," Shane said. "After all they've been through, these kids are still so optimistic.

"They've learned to make the best of every situation. It's a great feeling to see how they apply themselves to their studies."

Alison Cohen works with Noel Amed.

Abdulah Kamarudin, Hassan Hassan and Jacob Morgan study together.

McGill fellows return to Mideast to promote peace

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Israeli Sarit Zik says her face "turned red more than once" during the heated exchanges she had with her Arab colleagues in a McGill University visiting fellowship program that seeks to promote dialogue and lasting links between Jordanian, Palestinian and Israeli (both Jewish and Arab) community workers.

Zik is one of the 10 fellows who arrived in Montreal last August for a year's study of graduate-level social work in the McGill Middle East Program in Civil Society and Peace Building (MMEP). The two-year program was launched four years ago to train a cadre of community workers dedicated to improving social conditions in their homelands and developing professional relations on a regional basis.

Over its four years, 25 other Israelis, Palestinians and Jordanians have completed the program.

The fellows recently went back to Israel, Jordan and the Palestinian Authority to complete the second year of the program. They will do field work at five "storefront" practice centres, modelled on Montreal's Project Genesis, located in low-income neighbourhoods in East and West Jerusalem, Beersheba, Nablus and Amman, applying the theory they learned at McGill. These centres, which are linked to universities and non-governmental organizations, help the disadvantaged take a more active role in improving their living conditions.

Zik, who worked with Arab citizens of Jaffa for three years, was nevertheless ill-prepared to share her anxieties over the violent conflict back home with "them."

Though it was emotionally draining, Zik calls the experience of studying side-by-side with her Arab neighbours "the most significant year of my life."

One month after the group's arrival, the intifadah broke out and Zik found herself amid people she perceived as "causing the problem."

Slowly, her thinking shifted from one of "us versus them," to a more common perspective on the conflict.

"Our dialogue raised significant questions about our own beliefs and values," she said at a "send-off" ceremony for the fellows. "It was not easy, but it was honest... I discovered we do not have to agree with one another, but we have to try to understand one another."

Zik thanked McGill for giving her and the other fellows the opportunity to get to know one another as equals, an impossibility in the Mideast because of the "psychological and political walls that divide us."

The camaraderie and affection among the fellows on their last day together was clearly genuine as they joked about surviving their first Canadian winter and weekend outings to the country home of professor Jim Torczyner, the MMEP's founder and guiding light.

Before leaving, Zik said she is going back with "the hope that things can be different." Now that she has gotten to know "the other side" and has made friends, she believes they can work together to "create a just, equal society that is a better place for all of us."

Palestinian Bilal Salameh, who was dean of students at An-Najah University in Nablus, agreed that this was a difficult year for Israelis and Palestinians to have to face one another so frankly.

"We are now building our state," he said. "Social justice can help our society and peace can be shared by all.

"Canada, with its cultural diversity, has given us an example of all people living and working together."

Ra'd Al Hadid of Jordan, who described himself as a dreamer, said he is going home determined to help fulfil the late King Hussein's dream of peace among the peoples of the region.

Al Hadid, who worked for the Red Crescent Society's refugee centre, quoted Shakespeare's reminder that that there is "a world outside our own." His time at McGill, he said, opened his eyes to that.

Torczyner, just back from a month in Israel, the PA and Jordan, said that "despite their fear, anger and anguish, everyone there wants the violence to stop and [the] dialogue to start in order to find a way forward.

"These 10 people will bring back the values, goals and drive to their homelands to help that happen. The trust, friendship and collegiality that has grown among them will last. We have vowed that, whatever the situation, we will help them maintain those links."

L'Chaim: a new family for the independent retiree

L'Chaim Retirement Home's founder, Judy Cohen, is fulfilling her vision of an idea whose time has come. At this unique home for your family's life.

Judy has given every detail her tender loving care, from the relaxing, cheerful decor, to the aquarium in the common independent older members, getting older really will mean getting better. At Sheppard and Maxwell, just west of Bathurst, L'Chaim is due to open in the second week of August. It's big enough to offer state-of-the-art features and services, yet small enough to devote personal attention to the individual — uniting safety and comfort with joie-de-vivre and quality of area, to choosing an on-site hairdresser.

It's less a retirement home, kibbitzes Judy, than an exclusive club. Consider the perks, and you too may want to join. "One customer," she chuckles, said 'Never mind you, Ma — I'm moving in'".

Judy has chosen L'Chaim's team for empathy and professional integrity. It includes Lorraine Sherkin, known for 30 years' devoted service at Baycrest; Dr. Suzanna Gross, a family physician with an affinity for the elderly; a new, highly skilled program manager; skilled homemakers — and Judy's dog Sable, a sweet creature who loves people.

Preferred units going fast

Within walking distance of banks, library and shopping, L'Chaim will keep its windows to the world wide open, with personal mail delivery, e-mail and internet access. Cable and private phones are available.

Activities include fitness, musical entertainment, games, outings, crafts, and Jewish programs such as Hebrew and Bible study. There will be Shabbos dinners, holy day observance, and three haymishe meals daily. There's a party room for seders and simchas, and a play area for visiting kids.

L'Chaim is healthful, environmentally friendly and smoke-free. Grab bars to reduce risk of falling, hand rails and non-slip flooring in the halls, and smoke and carbon monoxide detectors are but a few of the safety features.

Look for an open house announcement in late July; but make your reservation soon; if you have logistical preferences (e.g. direction of exposure). Preferred units are going fast.

Judy is gratified that the community has embraced L'Chaim so readily. "I was always confident," she explains; "but until you move from the drawing board to the live stage, you never know."

L'Chaim is a member of the Ontario Residential Care Association. For more information, call Judy at 416-398-7898 or e-mail her at info@lchaimretirement.com.

Drink smart! Drink Smart(fx)

Remember when health foods were a niche market? Gone are the days... Today, kids and seniors, singles and families, all want to eat and drink healthier. And they want everything to taste delicious, too.

This is no passing phase. Peter Webster, general manager and founder of Smart(fx) Beverage, knows this shift in awareness is long- term, here to stay. And he's put his money where his mouth is, with three funky, bold, yet soothing new beverages.

Webster founded Smart(fx) in 1996 with one single product. This beverage, called ORIGINAL, is still going strong. It's a unique blend of citrus juices and herbal extracts, with a refreshing, wake-up taste.

In May 2000, Smart(fx) added to its repertory a second beverage, PURE GENIUS, with a cranberry juice base. And in February 2001, the company brought out GONG, a peppy blend of raspberry juice, apple juice and Japanese green tea.

Every Smart(fx) beverage is made only from natural juices and herbal extracts, with no artificial flavours, sweeteners, colours or preservatives. For millennia, each extract, from herbs such as ginseng and echinacea, has been hailed for healthful effects on the immune system, metabolism, energy level and alertness.

What you see settled at the bottom or floating in the bottle is juice pulp (fibre) or natural extracts. Drink it: it's good for you, like pulp from old- fashioned, fresh- squeezed juice. In fact, to stir that natural goodness up, shake it well before opening.

And never, ever dilute the fantastic Smart(fx) taste with water! Blending with your favourite spirit is OK, though; and it's a stimulating martini mix.

A Smart(fx) beverage doesn't just tantalize your thirst, but quenches it. It's low in carbohydrates, and doesn't boost, then sink your energy levels with a sugar overdose. Instead, it relaxes as it energizes, making you eager to step out and enjoy life, while giving you added staying power.

Smart(fx) is pasteurized, so as long as it's sealed, it has at least a one year shelf life. After opening, it will keep for several days in the fridge.

Drink as much or as little as makes you feel good. Guzzle an entire bottle in one swoop; or prolong the joy in many slow sips.

Smart(fx) company strategy focuses on producing and marketing a few high-quality products, for health- conscious customers in search of new, interesting flavours. All three products have struck resounding notes of success-- and won acclaim from the health food industry.

Every fall, at the Canadian Health Food Association conference and trade show, the Alive Academy of Nutrition gives out the Alive Excellence Awards. Here, health food retailers vote on products in about 20 categories.

Smart(fx) has competed in 1998, 1999 and 2000. In the best beverage category, they have won three medals: bronze in '98, silver in '99, gold in 2000. In best sports nutrition, they have won bronzes in '98 and '99, and a silver in 2000.

Smart(fx) area managers, with warehouses across Canada, cover every type of distribution: food service (cafes, restaurants, etc.), convenience stores, grocery stores, and the growing health and fitness sector (everything from health food stores to golf clubs).

Now, Smart(fx) is going international; and the kosher market is opening up. Their Canadian distributor and cash & carry wholesale is Foodfest International. Foodfest is located at 60 Doncaster Ave., Unit 1, Thornhill, 905-709-4775. All Smart(fx) products are fully kosher, guaranteed and certified with OU in New York.

For more information, visit the Web site at www.naturaldrink.com. To find Smart)fx) in your area, call 416-621-4901 ext. 325; or 1-800--784-1350, also ext. 325. Ask for it by name. "If it's not where you want it to be," Webster says, "let us know and we'll get it there."

During the month of July and beyond, the following stores in the GTA are featuring Smart(fx) products:

- Sobeys, 441 Clark Ave., Thornhill;
- Kosher City Plus, 3468 Bathurst St., Toronto;
- Hermes Bakery, 2885 Bathurst St., Toronto;
- Steve Adeles No Frills, 270 Wilson Ave., North York

Cohen brothers celebrate special relationships

By HEATHER CHEIFETZ
Special to the CJN

WINDSOR — Forget Philadelphia. Windsor is truly the city of brotherly love.

Joe Cohen, 101, and his younger brother Sam, 95, are not only siblings who remain active in the Jewish community, they are also best friends.

Seniors Scene

"Some brothers, they fight over a penny," Sam says. "Not us. We get along very nice."

The two are inseparable, say family members who keep a close eye on the pair.

Meeting each day around 3 or 4 o'clock, Joe and Sam go for walks, attend exercise classes, have dinner or just sit and talk, with Sam inevitably finishing Joe's sentences.

"You have to speak up, I don't hear so good," Joe warns me at the start of the interview. "Any questions he doesn't answer, I'll answer for him," Sam says.

"After so many years, you'd think they would run out of things to say to each other," says Joe's son Morry, 71. "I once watched them talk non-stop during an eight-hour plane ride. It's amazing."

Living in the same apartment building also has its advantages. Joe admits that being directly above his brother is very convenient.

"I stomp on the floor when I want to tell him something," he laughs. "It's true!" Sam says.

Sam (left) and Joe Cohen

Born in 1900 in Karvasar, Russia, Joe was one of six children born to Moishe and Sarah Cohen. Sam was the youngest, born five years later.

Karvasar, which Joe compares to "East Windsor in the 1930s," was a shtetl of 7,500 families located just steps away from the larger city of Kamenets, Podolsk, close to the Romanian border.

Life was not easy for Jews in those times. Joe and Sam remember the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution being a temporary reprieve from the daily hostilities.

"When the local Bolshevik leader came in, for the Jews it was an open door," Joe recalls. "We could go to school, practice our religion; the pogroms had stopped. Many of the Jews were Bolsheviks."

But the respite didn't last long. Soon the Bolsheviks were overthrown (new regimes only lasted a few months before being overthrown themselves). After enjoying some measure of freedom, the Jews of Karvasar were terrified.

When Isaac, Moishe's eldest son, turned 21, Moishe sent both him and Joe to Romania to evade mandatory conscription into the Russian army. Joe stayed four years before immigrating to Canada. Isaac never left Romania.

After Sam turned 21, he also left Karvasar, joining his brother Joe in Canada.

Moishe died later of natural causes; the rest of their family were murdered in the Holocaust.

Joe settled first in Kenora, Sask., where he met Sophie Lewis. Sophie's parents had an uncle in Windsor, so when the young couple decided to marry, they moved there permanently. Sophie died of cancer nine years ago, after they had been married for 63 years.
